Preface

My first visit to Strasbourg was in 1993 when I accompanied a team of law students from the Université du Québec à Montréal to participate in a French-language moot court held before a simulated European Court of Human Rights. The following year, the student team from my university actually won the competition. I was able to share with them a two-week stage at the European Commission on Human Rights later that year, sworn to silence because of the secrecy of the proceedings.

There was great concern then about the future of the Convention institutions. Indeed, it seemed then as if the European Court was confronting a profound crisis. The case load was increasingly burdensome, several new countries had recently joined the system as the Council of Europe expanded eastward, and there appeared to be a degree of tension between the two Convention organs that we were able to see in action, the Commission and the Court. This sense of uncertainty did not diminish in the years that followed. Modifications were made to the system in an effort to adjust. But the amendments had barely entered into force before talk began about a new phase of changes. Yet the Court's survival, and its success, cannot be doubted. In modern human rights, it is one of the great stories of success. Moreover, it has contributed hugely to the creation and maintenance of a zone of peace within a continent that, over the decades and indeed centuries that preceded its establishment, had seen the most destructive wars in human history.

The seeds of the European Convention on Human Rights were sown by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 10 December 1948. Several of the personalities involved in that process went on to play an important role in the drafting of the Convention. Of course, only some of the rights in the Universal Declaration were transposed to the Convention. Those that were incorporated, be it in the Convention itself or the Protocols adopted subsequently, were then applied and interpreted by the European Commission and the European Court as well as, but to a lesser extent, by national courts where the Convention was applicable. In this way, albeit indirectly, the case law under the European Convention on Human Rights also constitutes judicial interpretation of the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Thereby, an important contribution is made to the elaboration of the general law of human rights, valid throughout the world, even in the absence of treaty obligations and a monitoring system. That is an enormous contribution. Not only has the Convention helped mould and protect European public order, it is responsible for important components of the global ius commune that ensures human rights and dignity for all.

Without any doubt, there is more academic literature on the European Convention on Human Rights than on any other treaty or system of modern human rights law. At the institutional level, the European Court of Human Rights, as well as the European Commission of Human Rights, before it closed its doors in 1998, have generated more case law than any other comparable bodies. It would take many volumes and thousands of pages to attempt to cover this material in anything resembling an exhaustive fashion. Of course, that is not the purpose of an article-by-article commentary. Rather, such an endeavour aims to provide a relatively succinct guideline to the treaty as a whole, with links and cross-references as well as indications for further reading in both the jurisprudence and the secondary literature. The case law is up to date as of 31 December 2014.

The idea for this project belongs to John Louth of Oxford University Press. The research and writing took somewhat longer than was expected, partly because the enormity of the venture was underestimated and partly because there were distractions along the way. I am grateful to John for asking me to undertake this challenge, and for his constant support and encouragement. The institutional support of the School of Law at Middlesex University is greatly appreciated. Special thanks are due to Catherine Funnell, the law librarian, for her invaluable assistance. I am also grateful to Zhao Xin, a student of mine at Sciences Po, who assisted me with some research. The most important support, however, was from Penelope, who insisted upon the book's importance. She encouraged me at every step of the way, not to mention her precious help in the final stages of proofreading.

1. The first part of the document discusses the importance of maintaining accurate records of all transactions. It emphasizes that this is crucial for ensuring the integrity of the financial statements and for providing a clear audit trail. The text also mentions that proper record-keeping is essential for identifying trends and anomalies in the data.

2. The second part of the document focuses on the role of internal controls in preventing fraud and errors. It highlights that a strong internal control system is necessary to ensure that all transactions are properly authorized and recorded. The text also notes that internal controls should be designed to be effective and efficient, and should be regularly reviewed and updated.

3. The third part of the document discusses the importance of transparency and communication in financial reporting. It emphasizes that stakeholders should be provided with clear and concise information about the company's financial performance. The text also mentions that transparency is essential for building trust and confidence in the company's financial statements.

PART ONE

INTRODUCTION

The European Convention on Human Rights was the first comprehensive treaty for the protection of human rights to emerge from the post-Second-World-War law-making process. The honour of being the first post-war human rights treaty might actually be accorded to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 9 December 1948.¹ But the Genocide Convention addresses a single manifestation of human rights violation and it is in many ways more akin to an international criminal law treaty, in that its main features are the definition of a crime and the identification of related obligations concerning its punishment. Adopted on 5 November 1950, the European Convention—its full name, rarely used today, does not even contain the adjective ‘European’: ‘Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms’—provides a list and definitions of several core human rights. It is far from comprehensive, its drafters having taken a very deliberate decision to exclude so-called economic and social rights. The Convention’s focus is largely on rights derived from national constitutions inspired by the ideas of Enlightenment.

The most significant normative influence on the drafters of the Convention was the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a resolution of the United Nations General Assembly adopted on 10 December 1948.² Prominent Europeans participated in the preparation of the Universal Declaration, first and foremost the French jurist René Cassin. Later, Cassin served as a judge and as President of the European Court of Human Rights. It was on Cassin’s insistence that the name of the Declaration was changed from ‘international’ to ‘universal’ in the final stages of the General Assembly’s work in 1948.³ The adoption of the Universal Declaration was in one sense premature because the initial intent of the United Nations had been to prepare a package of instruments, one of them a manifesto or declaration and the other a treaty or covenant, together with mechanisms for implementation of human rights. Collectively, these are referred to as the International Bill of Rights.⁴ Although the work on these projects went on simultaneously, sometimes within Credit for the first use of the term ‘universal declaration of human rights’ belongs, however, to a member of the Commission on the Status of Women, Evdokia Uralova of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic: UN Doc. distinct working groups of the Commission on Human Rights,⁵ by mid-1948 it had become clear that the Universal Declaration was nearing completion while the other instruments required more work and consultation. The General Assembly chose to forge on with adoption of the Universal Declaration, insisting that the United Nations Commission on Human Rights pursue its work on the other components of the Universal Bill of Rights. In 1949, the Commission on Human Rights made considerable headway on a draft covenant on human rights. That text, together with the International Declaration adopted the previous December, provided the European negotiators with model provisions on which their own convention was to be based.

Adoption of the Convention

The origins of the European Convention on Human Rights and of a Court with the jurisdiction to adjudicate complaints filed by individuals against their own governments date to the Congress of Europe convened in The Hague in May 1948 by the International Committee of Movements for European Unity. The Congress issued a 'Message to Europeans' that included the following:

2. We desire a Charter of Human Rights guaranteeing liberty of thought, assembly and expression as well as the right to form a political opposition;
3. We desire a Court of Justice with adequate sanctions for the implementation of this Charter . . .

The Congress also adopted a resolution expressing its conviction that a European Assembly 'should make proposals for the establishment of a Court of Justice with adequate sanctions for the implementation of this Charter [of Human Rights], and to this end any citizen of the associated countries shall have redress before the Court, at any time and with the least possible delay, of any violation of his rights as formulated in the Charter'.¹ The International Council of the European Movement met in Brussels in February 1949, adopting recommendations on human rights that also included proposals on the European Court.²

The Council of Europe was founded on 5 May 1949 by the Treaty of London. The Statute of the Council of Europe was signed in London on that day by ten states: Belgium, Denmark, France, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and the United Kingdom. Much like the Charter of the United Nations, although the Statute of the Council of Europe leaves no doubt about a commitment to human rights, it does not offer any real insight into the substance of the subject. There had been an unsuccessful proposal to integrate a declaration of human rights within the Statute of the Council of Europe.³ The Preparatory Commission for the Council of Europe met in Paris from 11 May to 13 July 1949. One of its tasks was the adoption of a draft agenda for the Council's Consultative Assembly. The initial proposal contained an item labelled '[m]aintenance and further realisation of human rights a fundamental freedoms'.⁴ It was agreed that this item should be included 'out of consideration for a particular provision in Article I(b) of the Statute'. The Commission's Report noted that although most countries represented 'have subscribed to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights' it was useful to keep the

Consultative Assembly, 1949

Meeting in August of that year, the Consultative Assembly of the Council considered the drafting of a convention on human rights. At the time, the Consultative Assembly was described as a 'unique' organ, 'something between the two extremes of an interparliamentary union and a federal parliament'.⁶ Its delegates represented much of the political spectrum that prevailed in post-war western Europe, although there is no evidence of participation from the communist parties that were relatively strong in countries like France and Italy. The contrast is striking with the debates about the codification of human rights within the United Nations, where there were sharp disagreements between political blocs aligned with the capitalist 'West', the Soviet Union, and the still nascent 'third world'.

The Consultative Assembly based its work upon a draft prepared by the Legal Committee of the International Council of the European Movement that had been presented to the Committee of Ministers in July 1949. The draft provided a list of fundamental rights, derived from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, but contemplated their detailed definition in a supplementary instrument that was to be negotiated, a process that was expected to be 'difficult and protracted'. Petitions concerning alleged breaches of the convention were to be implemented by a 'European Human Rights Commission' and a 'European Court of Human Rights'.⁷

During late August and early September 1949, the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions of the Consultative Assembly debated the draft text under the leadership of its Rapporteur, Pierre-Henri Teitgen. He presented the Committee's report to the plenary Assembly, where the text was again debated. On 8 September, the Consultative Assembly adopted a resolution calling upon the Committee of Ministers to adopt a human rights convention and to create a commission and court for its implementation. It also adopted a draft convention that was relatively succinct and that was largely derived from provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The draft convention did not include economic, social, and cultural rights, to the disappointment of several of the more left-wing members of the Assembly. There was an unresolved debate about whether to include the right to property and the right of parents to determine the education of their children, set out in articles 17 and 26(3), respectively, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.⁸

Committee of Experts

The Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe met in November 1949 and decided to convene a Committee of Experts for the purposes of advancing the work on the draft, 'paying due attention to the progress which had been achieved in this matter by the competent organs of the United Nations'.⁹ This did not sit well with the Consultative Assembly, whose Standing Committee adopted a resolution objecting to the approach taken by the Committee of Ministers. The Standing Committee said that 'it would be regrettable if this Committee [of Experts] was to be given a mandate to undertake the study of the question ab initio; the more so since the Assembly's draft was in fact based on work done by the United Nations'.¹⁰

Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts met in February and March 1950. In fact, there were few 'experts' in international human rights law at the time, at least in the sense that we now understand this notion. Virtually all of the names of the participants are unrecognizable to scholars and jurists working in the field of human rights today. By and large, they were functionaries within foreign ministries, politicians, and academics, perhaps with some knowledge of public international law in a general sense.¹¹ The few important Europeans whose names are familiar because of their participation in the debates during the 1940s surrounding the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and their authorship of serious doctrinal studies—Hersch Lauterpacht, René Cassin, Charles de Visscher—were apparently not called upon by their governments to assist in drafting the Convention. Another distinguishing feature is the total absence of women from the Committee of Experts. Indeed, there is no evidence in the travaux préparatoires of any significant involvement of women in the drafting of the European Convention. By contrast, one of the very important features of the drafting of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was the participation of women. The United Nations Commission on Human Rights was chaired by a woman, Eleanor Roosevelt, and her name is best known, but many other women—Hansa Mehta, Bodil Begtrup, Jessie Street, Minerva Bernardino, to name only a few—participated actively in its drafting through their membership in various United Nations bodies, including the Commission on Human Rights, the Commission on the Status of Women, and the General Assembly.

The Committee of Experts set up by the Committee of Ministers could not agree on the approach to be followed. The difficulty was not about whether to follow the initiatives already taken in the United Nations but rather about which initiative to follow. The United Nations International Bill of Rights consisted of two distinct instruments: a manifesto or declaration, already adopted as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and a convention or covenant, still very much in draft stage. There were two main schools of thought within the Committee of Experts. The first was supportive of the text adopted the previous year by the Consultative Assembly. The provisions setting out fundamental rights were based upon those of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The second school, of which the United Kingdom was the most prominent member, took the view that 'the fundamental rights to be safeguarded, and, even more important, the limitations of these rights, should be defined in as detailed a manner as possible'.¹² Its reference was the much more detailed draft treaty or covenant then being considered by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. France and the Netherlands felt that if the United Kingdom's approach were to be followed, the work on drafting the European convention ought to be suspended until the United Nations had concluded its work,¹³ a view that thankfully was not accepted because the United Nations texts were only adopted in 1966. The Committee of Experts agreed that it was impossible to reconcile the two approaches 'since the systems on which these two drafts were based were essentially different'.¹⁴ Therefore, it submitted both drafts to the Committee of Ministers, inviting it to take a decision on the model to be followed. The text based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and described as 'Enumeration of Human Rights', was labelled Alternative A. The text that was derived from the British draft, characterized as 'Definition of Human Rights', was labelled Alternative B. In fact, each of the two Alternatives had two variants. Alternatives A and B were premised on a system with both a Commission and a Court, while for Alternatives A/2 and B/2 there was a Commission but no Court.

Regardless of the approach to be taken, it is clear that those who drafted the European Convention devoted little interest to the content of the fundamental rights. With some exceptions, they were generally content to rely upon the conclusions reached within the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly as to the substance of the rights and their formulation. There was an important debate with the Consultative Assembly about whether to include economic and social rights. But when it came to the definitions of the rights, something on which the United Nations organs had laboured intensively, there was almost no debate during the drafting of the European Convention. The most controversial rights were the three that were left out of the Convention itself, although they were incorporated in Protocol No. 1, adopted the following year. The debates about defining those three rights consumed more time and energy than all of the substantive rights in the Convention itself taken together.

The real focus of the attention of the Committee of Experts was on the mechanisms for implementation of the Convention. The initial idea, advanced by the Congress of Europe at its meeting in The Hague in 1948, was for a human rights court. The idea had been actually been mooted within the United Nations as part of the early discussions about the International Bill of Rights. Just as it proved difficult to secure any consensus in New York, the proposal for a fully fledged court was also controversial in Europe. In order to answer critics who said the court would be overwhelmed by frivolous claims and abused for political aims, the suggestion emerged that a human rights commission also be established. The idea of a commission proved to be less controversial than a court. The Committee of Ministers suggested two alternative systems, one with a court and one without. The package was complex: a European Commission of Human Rights with authority to deal with the admissibility of petitions, fact-finding, the encouragement of friendly settlement, and jurisdiction to provide an opinion on whether there was a violation of the substantive provisions of the Convention; a Court empowered to make final, binding judgments on cases referred to it by the Commission or by a State Party; and the Committee of Ministers, also entitled to provide a final and binding decision with respect to cases that could not be or were not referred to the Court.

Conference of Senior Officials

The Committee of Experts submitted its report and the two drafts to the Committee of Ministers. The latter decided to convene a Conference of Senior Officials whose mandate would be to finalize a draft proposal. When the Conference of Senior Officials met in June 1950, it was fairly evenly divided between partisans of the two alternative approaches, with France, Ireland, Italy, and Turkey favouring the 'enumeration' approach based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Greece, Norway, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom championing much more detailed provisions containing definitions.¹⁵ It was also split on the desirability of establishing a Court, although the majority was opposed to the idea.¹⁶ The two ideas were somewhat linked because both Belgium and Luxembourg said that if a Court were created they would prefer enumeration, whereas if it were not they favoured definition.¹⁷ The Conference agreed to set up a drafting committee whose task was 'to improve alternative B by including certain provisions from alternative A' and to incorporate any new amendments that had already been adopted.¹⁸ In substance, the Conference opted for the much more detailed approach to definition of rights favoured by the British. The result was 'submitted to the Committee of Ministers as a compromise suggestion, supported by the majority of the Conference'.¹⁹ The compromise was subsequently endorsed by the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions of the Consultative Assembly at its meeting held later in June 1950.²⁰

Final stages

The Committee of Ministers met in early August to finalize the draft Convention. Agreement had already been reached on the definition of the substantive rights with the exception of property, education, and free elections. The heart of the debate concerned the means of enforcement. Strong opposition remained to the creation of the Court as well as to the existence of a right of individual petition. The Committee of Ministers found a compromise by means of two distinct optional clauses. The first recognized a right of individual petition to the European Commission on Human Rights, but only if the State Party to the Convention had accepted this by means of a separate declaration. The second acknowledged the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights, provided, once again, that this had been agreed to by the State Party through a declaration.

The draft adopted by the Committee of Ministers was then transmitted to the Consultative Assembly for its renewed consideration. The Consultative Assembly recommended that the draft be amended so as to include recognition of the right to property, the rights of parents to determine the education of their children, and the right to free elections. It did not reconsider the decisions of the Committee of Ministers to adopt the 'definition' approach rather than the 'enumeration' approach that the Assembly had favoured a year earlier. Speaking to the point, Pierre-Henri Teitgen lamented the decision, noting that '[t]he definitions put forward by the British might well be very dangerous, indeed, if they were to be taken as restrictive, for it is extremely difficult to list all the possibilities contained in a single freedom and all those excluded therefrom'.²¹ In an attempt to correct the problem, Teitgen proposed an additional article for the Convention, declaring that it be interpreted in light of 'general principles of law recognised by civilised nations'.²² The Assembly's Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions did not take up his idea.²³ In the Consultative Assembly, David Maxwell Fyfe urged adoption of the Convention as 'a beacon to our friends who are now in the darkness of totalitarianism' and as 'a passport for the return of their countries into our midst'.²⁴ There was also much dismay among the members of the Consultative Assembly with the decision to relegate the right of individual petition to an optional clause.

Adoption and entry into force

The Committee of Ministers proceeded with the adoption of the text but without most of the changes proposed by the Consultative Assembly. These were referred to a committee of experts for consideration, the suggestion being that they should be incorporated subsequently in a protocol. On 4 November 1950, the Convention was signed by all but two of the Member States of the Council of Europe in the Barberini Palace in Rome.

According to the memoirs of David Maxwell Fyfe, Paul-Henri Spaak notified him of the signing ceremony in the following terms: 'It is not a very good Convention, but it is a lovely Palace.' Inevitably, some were disappointed with the political compromises that led to omissions in the Convention. Maxwell Fyfe was more positive than Spaak, believing that 'we had succeeded in doing what the United Nations had failed to do, namely to create an enforceable convention guaranteeing democratic rights'.²⁵ Later that month, Greece and Sweden also signed the Convention. The first ratification, by the United Kingdom, was submitted on 8 March 1951. On 3 September 1953, Luxembourg became the tenth State to ratify the Convention, bringing with it the entry into force of treaty.

With the Convention in force, the Committee of Ministers elected the initial members of the European Commission of Human Rights in May 1954. The Commission held its first session in July 1954. At the time, it had no individual applications to consider because the 1950 text of the Convention required a separate declaration by States for the individual petition mechanism. However, no such declaration was required for inter-State complaints. On 7 May 1956, the first such application was filed. It was submitted by Greece against the United Kingdom concerning the application of the Convention in Cyprus.²⁶ The Commission issued a report on the first of the applications in 1958. It was critical of British conduct in Cyprus but did not actually conclude that there had been violations of the Convention. The Committee of Ministers decided to take no further action when Greece and the United Kingdom indicated that agreement had been reached on the independence of Cyprus.²⁷ Greece had also filed a second application against the United Kingdom about Cyprus.²⁸ The Commission's report was not finished at the time of the independence agreement. The Committee of Ministers treated it in the same way as the first application. A report on the second application was not completed because Greece settled the case with the United Kingdom.²⁹ The third inter-State application was filed by Austria against Italy, in 1960, with regard to the rights of German-speaking residents in the Süd Tirol/Alto Adige. The Commission did not conclude that the Convention had been violated.³⁰

The right of individual application came into force on 5 July 1955. Almost immediately, individual applications began to be lodged at the headquarters of the Council of Europe in Strasbourg, although at a rate that seems paltry by comparison with the present day. Between the entry into force of the procedure and the end of 1957, 343 individual applications were filed with the Commission, an average of about 31 per month.³¹ In 1958 and 1959, 329 applications were registered, a slight quickening of the pace.³² The vast majority of these early applications were declared inadmissible on such grounds as failure to exhaust domestic remedies and lack of temporal jurisdiction. By 1958, the

Adding new rights to the Convention

Those who drafted the European Convention, in 1949 and 1950, never intended it to be an exhaustive codification of fundamental rights. This can be seen in the final recital of the Preamble to the Convention, which speaks of the inclusion of 'certain of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration'. Since the adoption of the Convention, the catalogue of substantive rights that it sets out has been supplemented by six Protocols. Some of the Protocols add new rights, reflecting developments outside the Council of Europe whereby certain norms were deemed to be part of the core entitlement of fundamental freedoms. Two of them reflect changing views within the Council of Europe and also more broadly about the compatibility of capital punishment, whose exercise was reserved as an exception to the right to life in article 2 of the Convention, with international law, human dignity, and the prohibition of ill treatment. At various times, the Council of Europe has also considered the adoption of protocols to the Convention dealing with the rights of national minorities, the rights of persons deprived of their freedom,¹ protection of the environment, and the inclusion of a fundamental right to equality between men and women.² Perhaps it will return to these ideas with future initiatives.

The six protocols that set out new rights within the Convention system are additional in nature in that they require ratification by States that are already party to the Convention. They do not amend the Convention as such. They have entered into force after acceptance by a relatively limited number of States Parties. Even Protocol No. 1 has not been ratified by all of the States Parties to the Convention. The consequence is a rather complex legal situation whereby the Convention itself and Protocol No. 1 applies to all States, subject to the occasional reservation, but the amending protocols apply in a somewhat piecemeal fashion. Fewer than half of the States Parties to the Convention have ratified all of the additional protocols.

Protocol No. 1: Property, education, elections

The first of the additional instruments was adopted in March 1952, very shortly after the Convention itself. It is technically known as the 'Protocol' because there were no others at the time. It was ordinarily referred to as the 'First Protocol' until the 1990s and since then as 'Protocol No. 1'. Three rights were added to the Convention system by Protocol No. 1: the right to property, the rights of parents with respect to the education of their children, and the right to free elections. All of them were inspired by provisions in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

When the Convention was adopted in November 1950, the Consultative Assembly had expressed considerable outrage at the absence in the Convention of provisions concerning the right to property, to education, and to democratic elections. However, despite the proposals included in the draft Convention that the Assembly endorsed in August 1950, the Committee of Ministers did not include these rights in the final version. Complaining that the original draft convention prepared by the Assembly had been 'curiously emasculated' by the expert bodies in 1950,³ Pierre-Henri Teitgen blamed the British for the omissions, charging that within the Committee of Ministers 'the will of the majority yields when confronted with one individual veto'.⁴

The Committee of Experts designated by the Committee of Ministers completed a preliminary report on the proposed Protocol in February 1951. It was then instructed by the Committee of Ministers to prepare a draft protocol. The matter returned to the Committee of Experts and further reports were submitted in April 1951 and June 1951. In July 1951, the Ministers' Advisers adopted the draft protocol prepared by the Committee of Experts and referred it to the Consultative Assembly for an opinion. The Consultative Assembly considered the subject at its December 1951 meeting, proposing some changes to the draft that were in turn accepted by the Committee of Ministers. In March 1952, the fifteen Member States of the Council of Europe signed the Protocol. It entered into force on 18 May 1953 with the tenth ratification, that of Turkey.

Protocol No. 4: Mainly movement and migration

As early as 1958, inspired by the work of the United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, the Consultative Assembly began work on a second protocol to the Convention by which new rights would be added.⁵ Several rights were considered, all of them appearing in the current draft of the United Nations International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: freedom from imprisonment on the ground of inability to fulfil a contractual obligation; freedom of movement; freedom to choose one's residence; freedom to emigrate; prohibition of arbitrary exile; the right to enter one's own country; prohibition of arbitrary expulsion; the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law; right of access on general terms of equality to public services in one's country; equality before the law (as opposed to equality in the exercise of rights and freedoms enshrined in the Convention, something assured by article 14); the right of minorities to their own cultural life.⁶

In January 1960, the Consultative Assembly formally adopted its proposal for a 'second protocol'.⁷ It had dropped several of the rights from its initial ambitious proposal. It removed the right of equal access to the public service.⁸ The Court has since observed that the drafting history of the Protocol shows 'unequivocally' that the Member States of the Council of Europe did not wish to recognize a right of access to public service similar to that of article 21(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and article 25 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.⁹ A text recognizing the rights of minorities to enjoy their culture was also eliminated from the draft adopted by the Consultative Assembly in 1960.¹⁰ The rapporteur, Hermod Lannung, said the draft was 'not of much help' and he reminded delegates that 'the proposal had been made that the matter be dealt with in a separate international instrument'.¹¹

The Assembly recommended that a Committee of Experts be convened by the Committee of Ministers in order to develop the text and produce a definitive version. The Committee of Ministers agreed to set up a Committee of Governmental Experts with instructions to study problems relating to the European Convention on Human Rights.¹² Chaired by an Italian expert, Ugo Calderara, sessions of the Committee of Experts were held from late 1960 to early 1963. The list of rights in the Protocol was further reduced. Equality before the law had been included in the 1960 draft of the Consultative Assembly. Adopted 'tentatively' by the Committee of Experts at its first meeting,¹³ it was later dropped from the draft text, only to reappear decades later in Protocol No. 12. The Committee of Experts also rejected the idea of a provision on the right to recognition as a person under the law, modelled on article 6 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.¹⁴

In the meantime, the Consultative Assembly returned to the subject of minority rights a year later with a recommendation that the Protocol contain a provision based on the following text: 'Persons belonging to a national minority shall not be denied the right, in community with the other members of their group, and as far as compatible with public order, to enjoy their own culture, to use their own language, to establish their own schools and receive teaching in the language of their choice or to profess and practise their own religion.'¹⁵ The initiative was obviously inspired by the adoption of article 27 of the draft International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by the relevant United Nations organs, although it actually went further, adding the right of minorities 'to establish their own schools and receive teaching in the language of their choice'. The Committee of Experts did not agree, excluding minority rights from the text.

The Committee of Experts presented its final text to the Committee of Ministers in early 1963. As the work on the 'second protocol' had advanced, two other Protocols dealing with legal and procedural matters were conceived and adopted.¹⁶ Consequently, what had been proposed as the 'second protocol' in 1960 was eventually adopted as Protocol No. 4.¹⁷ An Explanatory Report prepared by the Committee of Experts accompanied it. The Explanatory Report compared the draft of the Consultative Assembly with that proposed by the Committee of Experts, providing additional comments on the provisions and reflecting some individual comments. The Explanatory Report does not offer any guidance as to its own legal significance. Subsequently, explanatory reports to Protocols to the Convention contain the following caveat: 'The text of the explanatory report prepared by the Steering Committee for Human Rights and submitted to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe does not constitute an instrument providing an authoritative interpretation of the text of the Protocol, although it might be of such a nature as to facilitate the understanding of the provisions contained therein.'

Protocol No. 4 was adopted by the Committee of Ministers and opened for signature and ratification on 16 September 1963. It entered into force on 2 May 1968 as a consequence of the fifth ratification.

Protocol No. 6 and Protocol No. 13: The death penalty

Two additional Protocols to the European Convention concern capital punishment. The first of them, Protocol No. 6, was adopted in 1983. Although article 2 of the European Convention recognized capital punishment as an exception to the right to life, subsequent human rights treaties in the United Nations and Inter-American systems adopted in the 1960s not only imposed several limitations on the use of the death penalty, but also contemplated the abolition of the practice. Legislation and judicial practice within Council of Europe Member States also evolved rapidly on the subject, making the reference in article 2 increasingly anachronistic.

Within the Council of Europe, the subject of capital punishment first appeared on the agenda of the newly created European Committee on Crime Problems in 1957.¹⁸ In 1962, the Committee created a special sub-committee on the death penalty and named French jurist Marc Ancel as rapporteur, with the mandate to prepare a study on capital punishment in Europe.¹⁹ The European Committee also asked the Centre français de droit comparé to conduct an inquiry on the subject, creating a scientific commission for this purpose. It was understood that the investigation would concern only common law crimes and exclude political and military crimes. Ancel's report concerned the status of capital punishment in the Member States of the Council of Europe, as well as Finland, Monaco, Portugal, San Marino, and Spain. Ancel's study noted that because of political developments in Europe earlier in the century some abolitionist countries had revived the death penalty, but that it would be an error to consider this as a renunciation of their commitment to abolition.²⁰ In 1966, the Committee of Ministers decided to discontinue any further study of the consequences of the abolition of the death penalty.²¹

Interest in the death penalty revived in 1973, when the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe sent a draft resolution²² on the abolition of capital punishment to the Legal Affairs Committee.²³ In June 1978, at a meeting of the European Ministers of Justice, the issue of capital punishment was addressed based upon a report presented by Christian Broda, the Austrian Minister of Justice and a well-known abolitionist. The meeting recommended: '... that the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe refer questions concerning the death penalty to the appropriate Council of Europe bodies for study as part of the Council's work programme, especially in the light of the Austrian memorandum and the exchange of views at the present conference'.²⁴ Pursuant to this resolution, the issue was then taken up by the European Committee on Crime Problems and by the Steering Committee on Human Rights, which sent a questionnaire on the subject to governments of the Member States.

The European Committee on Crime Problems issued an opinion that noted the widespread abolition of the death penalty de jure and recommended that new norms be adopted with a view to abolition. The Steering Committee on Human Rights also prepared an opinion stating that the time had come for the Council of Europe to consider either aligning article 2 of the Convention with the more recent article 4 of the American Convention on Human Rights or simply abolishing the death penalty.

In May 1980, spurred by an announcement the previous year from the Austrian and West German Ministers of Justice, the Conference of European Ministers of Justice noted that article 2 of the European Convention 'does not adequately reflect the situation actually attained in regard to the death penalty in Europe'. It recommended that the Committee of Ministers study the possibility of establishing new norms in Europe that would contemplate abolition of the death penalty. The meeting suggested two solutions: amendment of article 2 of the European Convention, along the lines of similar 'amending' protocols, or adoption of an optional protocol requiring a certain number of ratifications before it would come into force. A 1980 report by the Legal Affairs Committee of the Parliamentary Assembly said that the death penalty was 'inconsistent with the new trends in criminology and criminal law' and that furthermore it was also contrary to human rights law,²⁵ notably the right to be protected from inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, as provided by article 3 of the European Convention. The report noted: 'Legally speaking, however, the European Convention on Human Rights does not preclude capital punishment. Article 2 even allows it expressis verbis.'²⁶ The report concluded that article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights should be amended in order to abolish capital punishment.²⁷

In September 1981, the Committee of Ministers mandated the Steering Committee on Human Rights to prepare a draft protocol concerning abolition of the death penalty 'in time of peace'.²⁸ At a meeting of Deputies in September 1982, the Steering Committee's draft additional protocol to the Convention was discussed and approved, formally adopting the text of the protocol in December 1982. Protocol No. 6 was opened for signature the following year and entered into force in 1985. The ink on Protocol No. 6 was hardly dry before efforts began to take abolition a decisive step further so as to prohibit capital punishment at all times and in all circumstances.

In 1994, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe adopted a resolution calling upon Member States that had not yet done so to ratify Protocol No. 6. The resolution praised Greece, which in 1993 had abolished the death penalty for crimes committed in wartime as well as in peacetime. It stated: 'In view of the irrefutable arguments against the imposition of capital punishment, it calls on the parliaments of all Member States of the Council of Europe, and of all states whose legislative assemblies enjoy special guest status at the Assembly, which retain capital punishment for crimes committed in peacetime and/or in wartime, to strike it from their statute books completely.' It urged all heads of State and all parliaments in whose countries death sentences are passed to grant clemency to the convicted.²⁹

On the same date, the Parliamentary Assembly also adopted a recommendation that deplored the fact that the death penalty was still provided by law in eleven Council of Europe Member States and seven States whose legislative assemblies had special status with respect to the organization.³⁰ The Assembly expressed shock that 59 people were legally put to death in Europe in 1993, and that at least 575 prisoners were known to be awaiting their execution. The Assembly said that application of the death penalty 'may well be compared with torture and be seen as inhuman and degrading punishment within the meaning of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights'. The Recommendation urged the Committee of Ministers to draft an additional protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights, abolishing the death penalty both in peace- and wartime, and obliging the parties not to re-introduce it under any circumstances. The recommendation also proposed establishing a control mechanism that would oblige States where the death penalty was still provided by law to set up a commission with a view to abolishing capital punishment.

The Parliamentary Assembly's 1994 recommendation that a new protocol be adopted, abolishing the death penalty in wartime, was greeted favourably by the Council of Europe's Steering Committee for Human Rights. However, the Committee of Ministers, in its decision of 16 January 1996, considered that the political priority was moratoria on executions, to be consolidated by complete abolition of the death penalty.³¹ The idea of a new protocol lingered until the Ministerial Conference, held in Rome on 3-4

November 2000, to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the European Convention on Human Rights. A resolution adopted at that meeting invited the Committee of Ministers 'to consider the feasibility of a new additional protocol to the Convention which would exclude the possibility of maintaining the death penalty in respect of acts committed in time of war or of imminent threat of war'.³²

Sweden took the initiative to prepare the text of a draft Protocol No. 13 whose legal effect would be to neutralize the wartime exception set out in article 2 of Protocol No. 6. Sweden's proposal was presented to the 7 December 2000 meeting of Ministers' Deputies and, a month later, that body instructed the Steering Committee for Human Rights 'to study the Swedish proposal for a new protocol to the Convention . . . and submit its views on the feasibility of a new protocol on this matter'. Using the Swedish proposal as a basis, the Committee asked its Committee of Experts for the Development of Human Rights to finalize a draft protocol and an explanatory report.

The Committee of Experts for the Development of Human Rights addressed this mandate at its June 2001 meeting. There was little disagreement about the substantive and procedural provisions of the Swedish proposal, which essentially replicate Protocol No. 6 except that article 2, which allows for capital punishment in time of war and imminent threat of war, has been eliminated. An informal survey at the meeting indicated that twenty-six of the thirty-five States that were represented were in immediate compliance with the proposed protocol. Of the nine that were not, seven experts indicated that the legal position in their countries might be reconsidered in the foreseeable future. One of the experts objected that the Protocol might impose different rules for Parties to conflict, particularly if one of the combatant parties was not a member of the Council of Europe.³³ The initial Swedish draft did not provide a descriptive title for the Protocol. It was added by the Committee of Experts in order 'to emphasise that abolition was complete, total and absolute'. Initially, the Committee opted to refer to 'complete abolition', but later returned to the suggestion that the title speak of 'abolition of the death penalty in all circumstances'.³⁴

The Committee of Experts for the Development of Human Rights transmitted the draft protocol and explanatory report to the Committee of Ministers on 8 November 2001. The Ministers' Deputies adopted the text of the Protocol and the Explanatory Report on 21 February 2002. It was opened for signature in Vilnius 3 May 2002.

The 2010 ruling of the European Court of Human Rights in Al Saddoon and Mufri holding the reference to capital punishment in article 2(1) of the European Convention to be no longer valid brings with it the conclusion that Protocol No. 13 (and Protocol No. 6) no longer serve any useful purpose.³⁵ If the death penalty is not recognized as an exception or restriction on the right to life in article 2(1), there is no need for a protocol. Two States, Russia and Azerbaijan, have not yet even signed Protocol No. 13. But if they are bound to protect the right to life pursuant to article 2(1), signature or ratification of the Protocol will not really change anything in their legal position.

Protocol No. 7: Concordance with the Covenant

Both the Convention and Protocol No. 4—but not Protocol No. 1—had been drafted with an eye to the current drafts of the international human rights covenant of the United Nations system. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1966.³⁶ The following year, the Committee of Ministers decided to consider 'problems [that] might arise from the coexistence of the European Convention on Human Rights and the United Nations Covenants'.³⁷ In 1969, the Committee of Experts reported back to the Committee of Ministers on various differences between the Convention and the Covenant.³⁸ In 1972, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, formerly known as the Consultative Assembly, considered the further development of the Convention system. Recommending the extension of the rights protected, the Assembly recalled that the objectives of the Council of Europe consisted of 'not only the maintenance but also the further realisation of human rights and fundamental freedoms'. It noted 'the work already done for the maintenance of human rights, thanks to the establishment and day-to-day functioning of the European Convention on Human Rights and its Protocols', adding that 'the growth of Europe can be soundly based only if it is founded on respect for the human being and if it endeavours to provide an increasingly wide guarantee of his fundamental rights'.³⁹

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights entered into force in 1976 with thirty-five States parties, several of them members of the Council of Europe.⁴⁰ That year, the Parliamentary Assembly recommended that the Committee of Ministers endeavour to insert as many as possible of the substantive provisions of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights in the Convention.⁴¹ The same year, a sub-committee of the Committee of Experts on Human Rights began consideration of extending the rights in the Convention, using the earlier report as a basis. In preparing what was to become Protocol No. 7, 'the committee of experts kept in mind in particular the need to include in the Convention only such rights as could be stated in sufficiently specific terms to be guaranteed within the framework of the system of control instituted by the Convention'.⁴² Moreover, '[i]t was understood that participation of member States in this Protocol would in no way affect the interpretation or application of provisions containing obligations, among themselves, or between them and other States, under any other international instrument'.⁴³

The Steering Committee for Human Rights finalized the draft text and transmitted it to the Committee of Ministers. Protocol No. 7 was adopted at the 374th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies. It was opened for signature on 22 November 1984, accompanied by an Explanatory Report. Protocol No. 7 only partially fulfilled the recommendation of the Parliamentary Assembly and did not achieve genuine concordance with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. For example, there is no recognition of the right of peoples to self determination, of the protection of minorities, or of the prohibition of hate propaganda and propaganda for war. Early drafts of Protocol No. 7 recognized a right of access to the public service similar to what appears in article 25 of the Covenant (and article 21(3) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights), something that has been noted by the Court.⁴⁴

Nevertheless, with the adoption of Protocol Nos 4 and 7, many of the differences between the protection of human rights ensured by the European Convention and by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights were removed. Nevertheless, two significant norms remained to be incorporated in the Convention: recognition of an autonomous right to equality and non-discrimination comparable to that of article 26 of the Covenant and recognition of the rights of minorities as set out in article 27 of the Covenant. The first of these was addressed with the adoption of Protocol No. 12. The second remains an active issue but with no resolution in sight.⁴⁵

Protocol No. 12: Non-discrimination

Unlike the Covenant, the original version of the European Convention contained only a limited equality rights provision. Article 14 is clearly an accessory right and its provisions only apply when another substantive right set out in the Convention is engaged. In 1958, the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe began to consider adding a general prohibition of discrimination to the Convention system by means of an additional protocol. The rapporteur of the Legal Committee prepared a list of suggested rights that included 'equality before the law' as set out in the draft of what became article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. He contrasted this with 'equality in the exercise of rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Convention', which was already covered by article 14 of the Convention and which had a counterpart in draft article 2(1) of the International Covenant.⁴⁶ The Consultative Assembly proposed two alternative provisions on the subject of equality before the law. The second of these contained a stand-alone prohibition of discrimination: 'No one shall be subjected by the State to any discrimination based on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, belonging to a national minority, property, birth or other status.'⁴⁷ The rapporteur warned, however, that:

a general non-discrimination clause is liable to cause insoluble problems, for instance, in regard to the treatment of foreigners; it might also cover private or social relations which are not within the province of the law. Such a provision might put all member countries under the obligation to write into their legislation effective guarantees against discrimination in every field of activity, including such private matters as the employment of workers in private enterprises, the lease of dwellings, the limitation by private associations of trade unions of their membership to certain categories of people, and so on. I, for my part, could not subscribe to a clause containing so vague, unlimited and imprecise a commitment—nor, I am sure, could the member States.⁴⁸

His views were endorsed by Marc-André Eissen, who spoke on behalf of Polys Modinos, the Council of Europe's Director of Human Rights.⁴⁹ The Assembly draft was subsequently considered by a Committee of Experts. It decided to exclude the equality provision from the draft of Protocol No. 4. The Committee of Experts noted that 'for various historical and sociological reasons the notion of equality before the law varied from country to country'. It concluded that '[i]n these circumstances, it was not thought possible to recognise the very general principle of equality before the law in a multilateral Protocol to the Convention on Human Rights'.⁵⁰

In 1970, the Parliamentary Assembly instructed the Committee of Experts on Human Rights to draft an additional protocol to 'secure the equal treatment of persons in the enforcement of the law and prohibit discrimination' with respect to voting rights in national and local elections, employment, particularly in public or publicly financed bodies, equitable allocation of public housing and access to the public service.⁵¹ The Committee of Ministers reacted negatively, concluding that 'it is not desirable or expedient to prepare such a protocol'. The Parliamentary Assembly returned to the point in 1972, with a Recommendation that the Committee of Ministers instruct the Committee of Experts to study the question of preparing a new protocol that would 'secure as an enforceable right the right of an individual not to be unfairly discriminated against on religious, political, racial or other grounds in respect of access to employment and allocation of housing' and also 'secure the equal treatment of persons in the enforcement of the law'.⁵²

In 1981, the Committee of Ministers issued a declaration on intolerance in which it decided to implement 'a programme of activities including, in particular, the study of legal instruments applicable in the matter with a view to their reinforcement where appropriate'.⁵³ This was an implied reference to the idea of a protocol to the Convention concerning equality and the prohibition of discrimination. The Steering Committee for Human Rights was pessimistic about the chances that the proposal could succeed.⁵⁴

Discussion about a new protocol resumed with a Recommendation of the Parliamentary Assembly, in 1989, that the Committee of Ministers 'instruct the Steering Committee for Human Rights to give priority to reinforcing the non-discrimination clause in Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights, either by adding health to the prohibited grounds of discrimination or by drawing up a general clause on equality of treatment before the law'.⁵⁵ Work by the Steering Committee for Equality between Women and Men and the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance led the Committee of Ministers to begin work on an additional protocol.⁵⁶ Concerns were largely addressed to issues of gender equality and those of racial discrimination and xenophobia.

In 1998, the Committee of Ministers mandated the Steering Committee for Human Rights to draft an additional protocol 'broadening in a general fashion the field of application of Article 14, and containing a non-exhaustive list of discrimination grounds'.⁵⁷ It finalized a draft protocol following consultation with the European Court of Human Rights and the Parliamentary Assembly. The latter was not at all happy with the draft prepared by the Steering Committee, criticizing its neglect of the right to equality as distinct from the prohibition of discrimination.⁵⁸ Its complaints were ignored, however, and the Committee adopted the text of Protocol No. 12 on 26 June 2000 and opened it for signature on 4 November 2000, the fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the European Convention on Human Rights. Protocol No. 12 entered into force on 1 April 2005. In a sense, its impact has been slight. There are only a handful of decisions of the Court that consider the provisions of Protocol No. 12. This might seem a surprising result considering the very dynamic role that article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights has had in the jurisprudence of the United Nations Human Rights Committee. According to Martin Scheinin, 'insufficient attention has been given to the fact that all member States of the Council of Europe already are parties to a very similar substantive human rights provision, the freestanding right to equality and non-discrimination enshrined in Article 26 of the ICCPR, and that almost all member States also have accepted the right of individual complaint in relation to the said provision'.⁵⁹ Alas, Protocol No. 12 has only been ratified by a minority of States Parties to the European Convention. The Parliamentary Assembly has said that it 'deplores the limited number of ratifications of Protocol No. 12'.⁶⁰

Universal Declaration of Human Rights contained provisions on the rights of minorities but they received insufficient support and were ultimately excluded from the final text. Proponents of the importance of the subject renewed the campaign during the drafting of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, where they met with more success. Article 27 of the Covenant declares: 'In those States in which ethnic, religious or linguistic minorities exist, persons belonging to such minorities shall not be denied the right, in community with the other members of their group, to enjoy their own culture, to profess and practise their own religion, or to use their own language.'⁶¹ Inclusion of minority rights within the European Convention was proposed as early as 1949 by Hermod Lannung of Denmark.⁶² Efforts were renewed a decade later, when Protocol No. 4 was being negotiated,⁶³ and again in the 1990s, when the subject returned to prominence within international human rights.⁶⁴ In 1995, members of the Committee of Ministers 'renewed their support for continuation of work on the drawing-up of an additional protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights in the cultural field, containing provisions guaranteeing individual rights, particularly for persons belonging to national minorities'.⁶⁵

As recently as 2012, the Parliamentary Assembly called for the preparation of a protocol to the Convention dealing with the rights of persons belonging to national minorities.⁶⁶ It suggested that such a protocol might include the right of every person to express freely his or her belonging to a national minority, political rights (such as freedom of association, the creation of political parties, participation in elections, representation in public bodies), at both national and regional level, cultural rights, including the right to cultural autonomy to preserve national identity, the right to take decisions on different forms of autonomy, and the right to freely use a minority language in private and public life.⁶⁷ But as with previous initiatives, the Assembly met with stubborn resistance in the Committee of Ministers. Its Steering Committee on Human Rights replied to the latest proposal by referring to several instruments whereby the rights of members of minority groups are protected, including article 14 of the Convention and Protocol No. 12. The Committee said that the present legal framework had led it to conclude that 'a new normative work in this field is not necessary'. It noted 'the absence of consensus on the very notion of "national minority"', adding that 'any effort to draft an instrument would inevitably come up against this major difficulty'. Finally, it expressed 'its opinion that it is not appropriate to accompany the ECHR with protocols setting out a range of rights applicable to specific groups of people'.⁶⁸

As early as 1978, the Parliamentary Assembly had proposed adding economic, social, and cultural rights to the European Convention. Specifically, it felt that the following rights were suitable for consideration: the right freely to choose or to accept a paid activity; the right of access to free employment services, vocational guidance and vocational training; the right to an adequate standard of living in the event of involuntary unemployment; the right to be affiliated to a social security scheme.⁶⁹ The rapporteur of the Legal Affairs Committee cautioned against adding a right to education. Given that it is already partially included in Protocol No. 1, he was concerned that such a measure might run the risk of lowering the level of protection if States did not ratify the new instrument. For the same reason, he did not consider trade union rights should be added, given their protection by article 11 of the Convention.

The idea was revived in 1998 by the Parliamentary Assembly with a request that 'the possibility of transferring individual rights from the Social Charter to the European Convention on Human Rights' be examined 'in order to create the basis for stricter legal observance'.⁷⁰ It asked the Committee of Ministers to consider the 'possible introduction of a procedure for the lodging of a complaint by either an individual and/or a government by further studying whether this could be best achieved in this new framework or by integrating some fundamental social rights into the system of the European Convention on Human Rights'.⁷¹ The following year, the rapporteur of the Social, Health and Family Affairs Committee of the Parliamentary Assembly wrote that '[a] protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights would make it possible to remedy deficiencies and would constitute an instrument for strengthening social cohesion, in particular with a view to putting an end to inequalities and safeguarding the interests of the most vulnerable sectors of society. The elaboration of such a protocol is, for the Council of Europe, the challenge of the next millennium'.⁷²

A protocol concerning recognition of the right to a healthy environment in the European Convention on Human Rights has also received attention in the Parliamentary Assembly. In 1999, the Parliamentary Assembly referred to 'changing living conditions and growing recognition of the importance of environmental issues', stating that 'the Convention could include the right to a healthy and viable environment as a basic human right'.⁷³ In 2009, it recommended that the Committee of Ministers draw up an additional protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights 'recognising the right to a healthy and viable environment'.⁷⁴ It recommended that the feasibility of drafting an amendment or an additional protocol concerning the right of individuals to a healthy and viable environment be examined.⁷⁵ The Assembly returned to the matter in 2003, calling for an additional protocol 'concerning the recognition of individual procedural rights intended to enhance environmental protection, as set out in the Aarhus Convention'.⁷⁶ The Steering Committee on Human Rights did not support the idea of an additional protocol, although it noted that the Convention system 'indirectly contributes to the protection of the environment through existing Convention rights', something it said was confirmed in the case law of the European Court of Human Rights.⁷⁷ When the Parliamentary Assembly again raised the issue in 2009,⁷⁸ it met with the same objections from the Committee of Ministers.⁷⁹

Two other unsuccessful proposals for new protocols were considered during the 1990s. In 1994, the Assembly proposed that the Committee of Ministers 'establish the principle of equality of rights between women and men as a fundamental human right in an additional protocol to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms'.⁸⁰ When Protocol No. 12 was being drafted, the Consultative Assembly unsuccessfully proposed that it include the following: 'Men and women are equal before the law'.⁸¹ In 2007, the Parliamentary Assembly reiterated its request for a new protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights to be drawn up enshrining gender equality as a human right. It stated that it was 'convinced that only a new protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights enshrining gender equality as a human right can ensure that remaining discrimination against women in civil law, both in the domestic legislation of Council of Europe member states and in private international law, is finally eliminated'.⁸² Again, in 2012, the Assembly called upon the Committee of Ministers to 'consider including the principle of gender equality in the system of the European Convention on Human Rights (ETS No. 5), through the elaboration of a new protocol'.⁸³

The other proposal concerned the rights of persons deprived of their freedom.⁸⁴ Work on the project by the Steering Committee on Human Rights was underway as early as 1992.⁸⁵ In 1996, the Steering Committee on Human Rights prepared a draft—it was to be Protocol No. 12—to the European Commission and the European Court of Human Rights for opinions. Subsequently, the Committee of Ministers said that the work of the Steering Committee 'has proved to be difficult' and that '[i]t appears necessary to take a fresh look at the question of how a protocol to the Convention could make a meaningful contribution to the protection of the rights of persons deprived of their liberty'.⁸⁶

There have been other suggestions for additional protocols but they have not had any significant momentum or generated serious developmental work. For example, in 1977, the Parliamentary Assembly recommended that the Committee of Ministers instruct the Committee of Experts on Human Rights to study the feasibility of adding a protocol to the European Convention 'to guarantee the independence of legal assistance'.⁸⁷ Sometimes, proposals take the form of unsuccessful motions within the Parliamentary Assembly, such as the 2013 suggestion of a protocol for 'protection of whistle-blowers who disclose governmental action violating international law and fundamental rights'.⁸⁸

Amending the Convention and reforming its machinery

Beginning with Protocol Nos 2 and 3 to the Convention, which were opened for signature and ratification on 6 May 1963, eleven Protocols have been adopted that modify or add to the provisions governing administration, procedure, and implementation. All but one of them, Protocol No. 16, is an amending protocol, requiring unanimous consent for entry into force. Protocol No. 16, which is not yet in force, enables the highest courts and tribunals of a State Party to submit a request for an advisory opinion to the Grand Chamber of the European Court. Unlike the other modifications to the implementation provisions, it would appear that such an advisory opinion procedure is able to operate without difficulty even if it is not accepted or desired by all States Parties to the Convention.

Protocol Nos 2, 3, and 5: Advisory opinions, procedural adjustments

Protocol No. 2 conferred upon the European Court the competence to deliver advisory opinions.¹ The original proposal first appeared in January 1960 in a Recommendation of the Consultative Assembly.² The Committee of Ministers reacted by asking the Committee of Experts to examine the desirability of such a modification of the Convention.³ The Committee of Experts reached a favourable conclusion and proceeded, upon further instruction of the Committee of Ministers, to prepare a draft protocol.⁴ It considered a request from the European Commission on Human Rights to give it the authority to request an advisory opinion but a majority of the Committee did not consider this to be an appropriate measure.⁵ Protocol No. 3 introduced several changes to the Convention concerning the functioning of the European Commission on Human Rights.⁶ It abolished the 'Sub-Commissions' that had been part of the original conception in the 1950 text of the Convention, and made minor changes to facilitate expeditious treatment of unfounded applications by the Commission.⁷ Protocol No. 5, adopted in 1966, was the result of proposals from the Court and the Commission intended to ensure an even rotation of terms of the members of the two bodies.⁸ As amending protocols, entry into force of Protocol Nos 2, 3, and 5 required unanimity of all States Parties to the European Convention. They entered into force in the 1970s. From that point on, their substantive provisions were deemed to be part of the Convention and ratification of the three Protocols was required of all new States Parties to the Convention. The relevant provisions of Protocol No. 2 were incorporated into the Convention as article 47, the result of Protocol No. 11. Those of Protocol Nos 3 and 5 became irrelevant with the abolition of the Commission, also a consequence of Protocol No. 11.

Protocol Nos 8, 9, and 10: Adjusting to the growing caseload

There were no further changes to the Convention mechanisms until the mid-1980s. Then, over the space of about a decade, very major reforms were undertaken by means of a series of Protocols that transformed the enforcement of human rights under the European Convention. Unlike the earlier Protocols, these were not efforts to fine-tune the provisions of the original Convention. Rather, they were prompted by the success of the system and the challenges posed by its growing caseload. The first such initiative, Protocol No. 8, was opened for signature on 19 March 1985.⁹ The major change effected by Protocol No. 8 was the authorization it gave the Commission to set up Chambers capable of exercising all the powers previously enjoyed by the plenary Commission. Provision was made so that the member of the Commission elected from the respondent State would sit ex officio in the relevant Chamber, a rule similar to what already existed for the Court. The Explanatory Report noted that '[t]he importance of ensuring that this member can participate in the examination of the petition lies in the fact that in most cases he will be the member who is most familiar with the legal system of the State concerned. The practice to date has indeed shown the usefulness of enabling a member of the Commission to sit when a case concerning his country is examined.'¹⁰ The reform also allowed restricted committees of the Commission to filter individual petitions that were manifestly inadmissible. A number of other reforms resulted from the Protocol. Seemingly important at the time, this was all quite ephemeral because more important amendments were yet to come. The only reform from Protocol No. 8 that still endures whose roots can be traced to this initiative is the provision for two Vice-presidents of the Court now found in article 25(a).

Protocol No. 9, which was adopted on 6 November 1990 and entered into force on 1 October 1994, allowed individual applicants a direct right of access to the European Court of Human Rights.¹¹ Until that point, the European Commission of Human Rights was the gatekeeper to the Court, where it acted on behalf of the applicant. The Plenary Court described the Commission's role as one of 'sifting'.¹² As the Explanatory Report noted, '[t]he idea of empowering individuals to seize the European Court of Human Rights is not a new one. It was mentioned as early as May 1948, at the Congress of Europe, and appeared in the draft European Convention on Human Rights drawn up by the European Movement in July 1949.'¹³ Rejected at the time, the idea was revived by a

Parliamentary Assembly Recommendation in 1972.¹⁴ Consulted by the Committee of Experts, both the Court and the Commission called for direct access by individuals to the Court.¹⁵ But in 1978, the Steering Committee for Human Rights, which was the successor body of the Committee of Experts on Human Rights, did not think a majority of States Parties was ready for such a change.¹⁶ The idea continued to gain momentum, and in 1990 the Committee of Ministers adopted a draft protocol providing for direct access to the Court.¹⁷

The Explanatory Report on Protocol No. 9 presented this as an idea whose time had come. It noted that individual access to the Strasbourg organs was already recognized, although only to the European Commission, and that all States Parties to the Convention had not only accepted the right of petition to the Commission but also the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court. It said that enabling the individual to seize the Court directly instead of depending upon the initiative of the Commission 'merely completes the existing structure'. It added that a system 'whereby the individual is granted rights but not given the possibility to exploit fully the control machinery provided for enforcing them, could today be regarded as inconsistent with the spirit of the Convention, not to mention compatibility with domestic-law procedures in States Parties'.¹⁸ It even signalled incompatibilities with the norms enshrined in the Convention: a denial of 'equality of arms', of the right to access to a tribunal and of participation in proceedings.¹⁹

Protocol No. 10, adopted in 1992, reduced the majority required for a finding of a violation of the Convention by the Committee of Ministers from two-thirds, as set out in the 1950 version of article 32(1) of the Convention, to a simple majority.²⁰ The Protocol never entered into force. It was overtaken by Protocol No. 11, which did away altogether with the determination of a violation of the Convention by the Committee of Ministers.

Protocol Nos 11, 14, 14bis, and 15: Consolidating the institutions, further reforms

The idea of merging the Commission and the Court had been considered since the early 1980s.²¹ The growing success of the Convention organs coupled with the expansion of the Council of Europe resulting from the end of the Cold War brought greater urgency to the reform initiatives. The caseload of both the Commission and the Court appeared to be growing almost exponentially. In 1988, the Parliamentary Assembly adopted a Recommendation stating it was 'convinced that it is particularly important to consider the possibility of replacing the Commission and Court by a single court with full-time judges resident in Strasbourg, while weighing carefully the arguments for and against'.²² The Steering Committee for Human Rights considered a report on the idea prepared by the Committee of Experts for the improvement of procedures for the protection of human rights. It instructed the Committee of Experts to draw up the detailed structure of such a single court.²³ The following year, the Committee of Ministers said that the idea of merging the two bodies 'albeit controversial, is still being examined'.²⁴ In 1990, Sweden and the Netherlands separately advanced proposals by which decisions of the Commission would be binding, as if it was a court of first instance rather than a preliminary chamber of the Court. The idea was considered by the Steering Committee for Human Rights.²⁵ However, this approach did not meet with consensus.²⁶

In November 1991, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Council of Europe decided to give priority to the reform of the Convention control mechanisms. The following year, the Parliamentary Assembly adopted a Recommendation supporting the creation of a single Court as a full-time body, a measure entailing the disappearance of the Commission. It insisted upon the urgency of the reform in light of the recent expansion of the membership of the Council of Europe to seventeen States, the expectation that this number 'will continue to rise in the next few years and that a considerable increase in the number of applications submitted to the Commission and to the Court is thus to be expected'.²⁷ Following a special meeting of the Ministers' Deputies on 28 May 1993, the Committee of Ministers decided to replace the existing system with a Court able to work in committees and Chambers with an effective mechanism to filter applications and to enable friendly settlements. It gave the Steering Committee on Human Rights terms of reference in this sense and instructed it to prepare a draft amending protocol.²⁸

Protocol No. 11 was finalized and opened for signature and ratification on 11 May 1994.²⁹ That year, the Commission and the Court moved into their new premises, a spectacular building designed by architect Richard Rogers that featured two saucer-like appendages, each containing a chamber. One was designated for the Commission, the other for the Court. This symbolized the vision of the Convention organs as set out in the 1950 text. Alas, in the course of construction the Council of Europe decided to abolish the Commission! Under Protocol No. 11, whereas judges in the 'former' European Court of Human Rights had served part-time, generally for one week per month, the 'new' Court consisted of full-time judges based in Strasbourg. It was established in 1998 following the entry into force of Protocol No. 11.³⁰

It was immediately apparent that the difficulties of the continually increasing caseload and the consequent unacceptable delays had not been solved by the disappearance of the Commission and the establishment of a full-time Court.³¹ Work on yet another amending protocol culminated in the adoption of Protocol No. 14, on 13 May 2004.³² The focus of Protocol No. 14 was on the filtering and subsequent processing of applications. Its changes to the operation of the Court included authorizing a single judge and a three-judge committee to deal with routine applications, as well as various other means enabling repetitive applications reflecting structural problems to be dealt with expeditiously.

Protocol No. 14 did not enter into force until 1 June 2010. Every State Party but Russia had ratified the Protocol by mid-2006.³³ The Duma ultimately agreed to ratification once an assurance had been given that a Russian judge would always sit in cases concerning the country.³⁴ In the meantime, frustrated by Russian obstruction, the Council of Europe adopted Protocol No. 14*bis*, a measure allowing for provisional application of certain provisions of Protocol No. 14 by those States that agreed until the main instrument could enter into force.³⁵ Protocol No. 14*bis*, which entered into force with three ratifications, actually applied for less than a year, from 1 October 2009 until 1 June 2010. The Explanatory Report noted that the delayed entry into force of Protocol 14 had made the situation confronting the Court 'deteriorate yet further in the face of an ever-accelerating influx of new applications and a constantly growing backlog of cases'. It said that this 'unsustainable situation represents a grave threat to the effectiveness of the Court as the centre-piece of the European human rights protection system'.³⁶

Protocol No. 15 followed a series of high-level meetings on the future and operation of the Court, beginning with the Interlaken conference, in February 2010, and the İzmir conference, in April 2011. The final such gathering was held in Brighton, in April 2012. It resulted in a Declaration containing a number of proposals for changes to the Convention. In short order, Protocol No. 15 was prepared in order to deal with some of these. It implements the unusual, perhaps unprecedented, change to the Preamble of the Convention with the addition of a new recital. It also addresses the retirement age of judges of the Court, in practice making it possible for them to serve until the age of 75, rather than 70. The Protocol also contains measures concerning procedure and admissibility, including a reduction to four months of the delay given applicants in making their initial submission to the Court following the exhaustion of the domestic remedies. The draft protocol and the draft explanatory report were prepared by the Steering Committee on Human Rights, then submitted to the Court itself and the Parliamentary Assembly for comments before final adoption by the Committee of Ministers on 24 June 2013.³⁷ Protocol No. 15 is not yet in force.

Protocol No. 16: Judicial dialogue

When Protocol No. 2 was being negotiated, in the early 1960s, the Court itself proposed the addition of two provisions, one to give the Court competence to deliver a 'prejudicial ruling' by which it would interpret a provision at the request of other courts or tribunals, the other to issue an advisory opinion at the request of a government arising from draft legislation.³⁸ These ideas were not pursued at the time. Frustrated with both the narrow scope of Protocol No. 2 and the fact that it was not in fact being implemented, the Court issued an opinion expressing its bewilderment at the failure of the Committee of Ministers to allow it to issue advisory opinions in response to requests from States for the interpretation of the Convention.³⁹ In 1978, the Steering Committee on Human Rights proposed that the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Court with a view to allowing advisory opinions at the request of States be examined. However, after reviewing the situation it decided against recommending any modification to Protocol No. 2.⁴⁰

The Group of Wise Persons in a 2005 report to the Committee of Ministers revived the idea. Its conclusion was that:

it would be useful to introduce a system under which the national courts could apply to the Court for advisory opinions on legal questions relating to interpretation of the Convention and the protocols thereto, in order to foster dialogue between courts and enhance the Court's 'constitutional' role. Requests for an opinion, which would be submitted only by constitutional courts or courts of last instance, would always be optional and the opinions given by the Court would not be binding.⁴¹

Protocol No. 16, adopted on 10 October 2013, allows the highest courts and tribunals of a State Party to request the European Court of Human Rights to give advisory opinions on questions of principle relating to the interpretation or application of the Convention or the Protocols.⁴² Like Protocol No. 15, the origins of Protocol No. 16 can be traced to the Declaration of the Brighton High-level Conference on the Future of the Court of April 2012. The Conference noted:

that the interaction between the Court and national authorities could be strengthened by the introduction into the Convention of a further power of the Court, which States Parties could optionally accept, to deliver advisory opinions upon request on the interpretation of the Convention in the context of a specific case at domestic level, without prejudice to the non-binding character of the opinions for the other States Parties; invites the Committee of Ministers to draft the text of an optional protocol to the Convention with this effect by the end of 2013; and further invites the Committee of Ministers thereafter to decide whether to adopt it.⁴³

The Committee of Ministers prepared a draft that met with the approval of the Parliamentary Assembly and of the Court prior to its adoption. Protocol No. 16 is not yet in force.

Interpretation of the Convention

In a formulation that appears in many judgments, the Court insists that 'the Convention must be interpreted and applied in a manner which renders its rights practical and effective, not theoretical and illusory'.¹ A variety of interpretative approaches can be taken to the European Convention on Human Rights.² Scholars of legal hermeneutics have often suggested that rules and maxims of interpretation are in reality arguments that judges use to justify a result that they already favour. The process of interpretation is not so much an objective exercise in establishing meaning as a rationalization for views that may be the result of policy orientations and personal prejudices. This is not the place to discuss the nature of legal interpretation. But bearing in mind the uncertainties in the process, the subject will be presented in an essentially descriptive fashion, setting out the various approaches that have been adopted in the case law.

At the time of the adoption of the European Convention on Human Rights, an existing body of international law had been developed in the jurisprudence of international courts and tribunals, and notably the Permanent Court of International Justice that operated from the early 1920s until it was replaced by the International Court of Justice at the time of the establishment of the United Nations. The International Court of Justice had only issued a few decisions when the European Convention on Human Rights was adopted. The principles of interpretation developed for the interpretation of treaties by the existing international courts as well as by arbitration tribunals were presumably understood by the drafters, who would have assumed that these would be applied to the European Convention. The Convention itself speaks to rules or principles of interpretation in only one place. Article 17 declares that '[n]othing in this Convention may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the Convention'.

Villiger, 'Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties in the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights', in Roland Bröhmer, Christian Collins, Christine Langenfeld et al., eds, Internationale Gemeinschaft und Menschenrechte, Cologne: Carl Heymanns, 2005, pp. 330–52; Laurence Burgogues-Larsen, 'Interpreting the European Convention: What Can the African Human Rights System Learn from the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights on the Interpretation of the European Convention?', (2012) 5 Inter-American and European Human Rights Journal 90; Olivier Jacot-Guillarmod, 'Règles, méthodes et principes d'interprétation dans la jurisprudence de la Cour européenne des droits de l'homme', in Pettiti et al., La Convention européenne, pp. 41–63; François Ost, 'Originalité des méthodes d'interprétation de la Cour européenne des droits de l'homme', in Mireille Delmas-Marty, ed., Raisonnement la raison d'Etat (vers une Europe des droits de l'homme), Paris: Presses universitaires de France, 1989, pp. 405–63; F. Matscher, 'Methods of Interpretation of the Convention', in Macdonald, The European System, pp. 63–82.

Early case law of the Court and the Commission referred to a variety of interpretative principles. For example, in Lawless v. Ireland members of the Commission made reference to the preliminary work or travaux préparatoires as a guide to interpretation,³ 'literal, historical interpretation',⁴ and 'strict interpretation'.⁵ In its judgment in the case, the Court rejected the use of the preparatory work given that the test of the Convention seemed clear and unambiguous, 'having regard to a generally recognised principle regarding the interpretation of international treaties'.⁶ In Wemhoff v. Germany, it considered the rules applicable to interpretation of bilingual treaties as well as purposive interpretation or teleology.⁷ In the Belgian Linguistic case, the Court rejected an interpretation likely to lead to an absurd result.⁸ In none of these early cases were their references to international jurisprudence as authority for the principles of interpretation. It cannot be said that at this stage in their development, the Convention organs had a coherent theory of interpretation of the Convention.

Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties

The rules of treaty interpretation applied by international courts and tribunals were codified in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, adopted in 1969 following an intense period of debate and negotiation within the United Nations International Law Commission.⁹ Three familiar articles of the Vienna Convention specifically address the interpretation of treaties:

Article 31. General rule of interpretation

1. A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.
2. The context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes:
 - (a) any agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connexion with the conclusion of the treaty;
 - (b) any instrument which was made by one or more parties in connexion with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the treaty.
3. There shall be taken into account, together with the context:
 - (a) any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the treaty or the application of its provisions;
 - (b) any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation;
 - (c) any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties.
4. A special meaning shall be given to a term if it is established that the parties so intended.

Article 32. Supplementary means of interpretation

Recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion, in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of article 31, or to determine the meaning when the interpretation according to article 31:

- (a) leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure; or
- (b) leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable.

Article 33. Interpretation of treaties authenticated in two or more languages

1. When a treaty has been authenticated in two or more languages, the text is equally authoritative in each language, unless the treaty provides or the parties agree that, in case of divergence, a particular text shall prevail.
2. A version of the treaty in a language other than one of those in which the text was authenticated shall be considered an authentic text only if the treaty so provides or the parties so agree.
3. The terms of the treaty are presumed to have the same meaning in each authentic text.
4. Except where a particular text prevails in accordance with paragraph 1, when a comparison of the authentic texts discloses a difference of meaning which the application of articles 31 and 32 does not remove, the meaning which best reconciles the texts, having regard to the object and purpose of the treaty, shall be adopted.

Since the adoption of the Convention in 1969, the European Court and European Commission of Human Rights have relied upon the provisions in the Convention dealing with treaty interpretation. Indeed, the Court began citing the Vienna Convention even before it had entered into force. In the 1975 judgment in Golder v. the United Kingdom, noting its agreement with submissions by both of the parties, the Court said that 'Articles 31 to 33 enunciate in essence generally accepted principles of international law to which the Court has already referred on occasion'.¹⁰ The European Court is not alone in applying the Vienna Convention principles to a treaty adopted prior to 1969, or to the entry into force of the Convention. For example, this practice has also been followed by the International Court of Justice.¹¹ The European Court has explained that although the Vienna Convention postdates the European Convention, 'the Court must have regard to its provisions in so far as they codify pre-existing international law'.¹² In addition to articles 31 to 33, the Court has occasionally invoked other provisions of the Vienna Convention.¹³

The 'general rule' or 'basis of interpretation' is set out in the four paragraphs of article 31 of the Vienna Convention. The core of the rule is in paragraph 1,¹⁴ although it cannot be dissociated from the subsequent paragraphs. Judge Ziemele has described it as 'the backbone for the interpretation of the Convention' and as 'one single rule of interpretation with several parts'.¹⁵ Referring to article 31 in Golder, the Court said 'the process of interpretation of a treaty is a unity, a single combined operation; this rule, closely integrated, places on the same footing the various elements enumerated in the four paragraphs of the Article'.¹⁶ Paragraph 2 has been described as 'the internal context' and paragraph 3 as 'the external context'. Paragraph 4 provides the 'reintegration of the intention of the parties'.¹⁷

In Golder, in resisting the incorporation of the rule of law as being within the object and purpose of the Convention the government referred to the preambular proviso that the Convention only codifies 'certain of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration'. The Court disagreed, affirming the 'profound belief in the rule of law' of the drafters, adding that it was 'natural and in conformity with the principle of good faith (Article 31 para. 1 of the Vienna Convention) to bear in mind this widely proclaimed consideration' in the interpretation of article 6 of the Convention.¹⁸

The Preamble to the European Convention has often been cited by the Court, sometimes with reference to article 31(2) of the Vienna Convention, which says it forms part of the 'context'. The Court has said that the preamble of a treaty is 'an integral part of the context'.¹⁹

Referring to article 31(3)(a) and (b), George Ress has described treaties as being 'set on wheels' by the processes of subsequent agreement and subsequent practice.²⁰ The first sub-paragraph of article 31(3), which deals with a 'subsequent agreement' between the States Parties, has attracted no significant attention from the European Court. In one judgment, without citing article 31(3)(a) the Court simply noted that '[t]here has been no subsequent agreement between the High Contracting Parties as to the interpretation of Article 5 in situations of international armed conflict'.²¹ There is more case law with respect to 'subsequent practice', something governed by article 31(3)(b).

The Court has generally invoked 'subsequent practice' of States Parties to the Convention without referring to the Vienna Convention provision. Dealing with provisions that have since been abrogated governing declarations recognizing the competence of the Commission and the Court, and concluding that these could not be accompanied by restrictions on territorial scope, the Court said: 'Since the entry into force of the Convention until the present day, almost all of the thirty parties to the Convention, apart from the respondent Government, have accepted the competence of the Commission and Court to examine complaints without restrictions ratione loci or ratione materiae.'²² It noted 'evidence of a practice denoting practically universal agreement amongst Contracting Parties'.²³ In Soering, the Court acknowledged that '[s]ubsequent practice in national penal policy, in the form of a generalised abolition of capital punishment, could be taken as establishing the agreement of the Contracting States to abrogate the exception provided for under Article 2 § 1 (art. 2-1) and hence to remove a textual limit on the scope for evolutive interpretation of Article 3'.²⁴ Two decades later, the Court referred to 'consistent State practice in observing the moratorium on capital punishment' as evidence 'that Article 2 has been amended so as to prohibit the death penalty in all circumstances'.²⁵ Finally, in Hassan v. the United Kingdom, it cited explicitly article 31(3)(b) in support of the view that 'a consistent practice on the part of the High Contracting Parties, subsequent to their ratification of the Convention, could be taken as establishing their agreement not only as regards interpretation but even to modify the text of the Convention'. In this respect, the Court noted a practice of States Parties of not derogating from obligations under article 5 of the European Convention in order to detain persons on the basis of the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions during international armed conflicts.²⁶

Article 31(3)(c) provides that relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties are germane to the context of the treaty. Indeed, the Convention 'cannot be interpreted in a vacuum'.²⁷ The Court has indicated that it has regard to the international law background as 'a set of rules and principles that are accepted by the vast majority of States' because 'the common international or domestic law standards of European States reflect a reality that the Court cannot disregard when it is called upon to clarify the scope of a Convention provision that more conventional means of interpretation have not enabled it to establish with a sufficient degree of certainty'.²⁸

The Court has an 'obligation to take account of the relevant rules and principles of international law and to interpret the Convention so far as possible in harmony with other rules of international law of which it forms part'.²⁹ Such relevant rules of international law come from several sources of which the three most important are identified in article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice: treaties, customary law, and general principles. There are many examples of international treaties being considered as part of the context for the purposes of interpreting the scope of provisions of the Convention.³⁰ Human rights treaties such as the Convention on the Rights of the Child,³¹ the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities,³² and the European Social Charter³³ are especially important here. The Court has cited many Council of Europe treaties on such matters as trafficking in human beings,³⁴ life imprisonment,³⁵ higher education,³⁶ and environmental protection.³⁷ This sort of reference to international law is very similar to what is increasingly the practice of national courts around the world, especially those dealing with human rights and constitutional matters. They refer to international law, including the European Convention on Human Rights,³⁸ as being relevant and persuasive³⁹ rather than as a binding source in the interpretation of their own domestic legal provisions.

With respect to the first of the international sources, treaties and conventions, although strictly speaking article 31(1)(c) is limited to treaties and other norms that are in force between the parties, the Court also considers international law more generally. Occasionally, the Court has insisted upon the fact that a State be bound by a particular treaty,⁴⁰ but this is the exception, and as a general rule in referring to international treaties for interpretative purposes the Court 'has never distinguished between sources of law according to whether or not they have been signed or ratified by the respondent State'.⁴¹ The European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights, adopted in 2000 and offering a fresher, more modern formulation than the sometimes archaic provisions of the European Convention, is especially influential, although it cannot be ratified by the significant minority of Council of Europe Member States that are not also part of the Union.⁴² Article 52(3) of the Charter specifies: 'In so far as this Charter contains rights which correspond to rights guaranteed by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the meaning and scope of those rights shall be the same as those laid down by the said Convention. This provision shall not prevent Union law providing more extensive protection.' The Court has also invoked the American Convention on Human Rights, unlikely ever to apply directly to more than a few European states.⁴³ In a case dealing with freedom of expression, the Court noted the reference in article 19(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights to information and ideas 'in the form of art' to support its conclusion that artistic expression was also included in article 10(1) of the Convention, despite the silence of the provision on this matter.⁴⁴ It has also relied upon the Convention on the Non-applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity,⁴⁵ the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide,⁴⁶ and the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.⁴⁷

The reference to international treaties goes beyond the sphere of human rights instruments. In recent years, the Court has made important references to international humanitarian law instruments, including the Geneva Conventions and their additional protocols.⁴⁸ In Marckx v. Belgium, article 8 of the Convention was interpreted with regard to the Convention on the Establishment of Maternal Descent of Natural Children, which Belgium had signed but not ratified, and the European Convention on the Legal Status of Children Born out of Wedlock,⁴⁹ which Belgium had not even signed.⁵⁰ Other examples include the European Convention on State Immunity,⁵¹ the Oviedo Convention on

The Court has said that it 'in defining the meaning of terms and notions in the text of the Convention, can and must take into account elements of international law other than the Convention, the interpretation of such elements by competent organs, and the practice of European States reflecting their common values', noting that the 'consensus emerging from specialised international instruments may constitute a relevant consideration for the Court when it interprets the provisions of the Convention in specific cases'.⁵⁶ In particular, it has said that the Convention is to be applied in accordance with principles relating to the international protection of human rights.⁵⁷ Rather than associate such reliance upon international law generally upon the reference in article 31(3)(c) of the Vienna Convention, the Court has explained that 'the common international or domestic law standards of European States reflect a reality that the Court cannot disregard when it is called upon to clarify the scope of a Convention provision that more conventional means of interpretation have not enabled it to establish with a sufficient degree of certainty'.⁵⁸ That is because in considering the object and purposes of provisions of the Convention, it may turn to the 'international law background to the legal question before it', which is 'made up of a set of rules and principles that are accepted by the vast majority of States'.⁵⁹ One example of such an 'emerging international consensus amongst the Member States of the Council of Europe' is the 'special needs of minorities and an obligation to protect their security, identity and lifestyle, not only for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of the minorities themselves but to preserve a cultural diversity of value to the whole community'.⁶⁰

References in the case law of the Court to the second source listed in article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice are rare. Customary and conventional law have a symbiotic relationship, and treaties often provide evidence to be considered in assessing the existence of customary legal rules at the universal or regional level.⁶¹ Accordingly, '[w]here the customary rule turns out to be different from the Convention provision, at least in its original form and intent, that rule may indeed affect the subsequent reading of the Convention provision'.⁶² Without suggesting that they are evidence of customary international law as such, the Court will often cite 'intrinsically non-binding instruments of Council of Europe organs, in particular recommendations and resolutions of the Committee of Ministers and the Parliamentary Assembly',⁶³ and the materials generated by the European Commission for Democracy through Law or 'Venice Commission',⁶⁴ and the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance,⁶⁵ and of the reports of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.⁶⁶ In a case dealing with immunities, it said that a provision of the International Law Commission's draft articles on immunities adopted in 1991 applied to the respondent State 'under customary law', with the consequence that it must be taken into consideration in assessing the right of access to a court.⁶⁷

The European Court of Human Rights has confirmed that 'general principles of law recognised by civilised nations', the expression used in article 38(1)(c) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, are among the relevant rules applicable to interpretation of the European Convention.⁶⁸ For example, '[t]he principle whereby a civil claim must be capable of being submitted to a judge ranks as one of the universally "recognised" fundamental principles of law; the same is true of the principle of international law which forbids the denial of justice. Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) must be read in the light of these principles.'⁶⁹ For Judge Fitzmaurice, '[g]eneral principles of law, it may be said, can, where relevant, properly be applied in the interpretation and application of a treaty provision, provided that the terms of that provision do not clearly exclude them'.⁷⁰ The Convention itself refers to 'the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations' in article 7(2) and to the 'the general principles of international law' in article 1 of Protocol No. 1.

The European Court of Human Rights has also referred to 'general international law', an expression that seems a convenient way of combining the two non-conventional sources of international law listed in the classic enumeration, namely customary law and general principles,⁷¹ although it must also include jus cogens.⁷² Josef Kunz defined 'general international law' as consisting of 'norms binding all members of the international community'.⁷³ The expression 'general international law' is used in the provisions of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties dealing with peremptory norm⁷⁴ and appears in judgments of the International Court of Justice.⁷⁵ The expression has been used since the earliest cases before the Court.⁷⁶ In an inter-State case involving a dispute about whether the applicant had acted with appropriate diligence, the Grand Chamber said 'general international law does, in principle, recognise the obligation of the applicant Government in an inter-State dispute to act without undue delay in order to uphold legal certainty and not to cause disproportionate harm to the legitimate interests of the respondent State'.⁷⁷ It cited as authority a judgment of the International Court of Justice.⁷⁸ In another case, the Court referred to 'rules of general international law reflected in the 1978 Vienna Convention on Succession of States in respect of Treaties and, to a certain extent, in the 1983 Vienna Convention on Succession of States in respect of State Property, Archives and Debts', a treaty not yet in force.⁷⁹ It has spoken of principles governing State responsibility for an internationally wrongful act under 'general international law'⁸⁰ and of the rules of general international law applicable to reservations to treaties.⁸¹

The Statute of the International Court of Justice also mentions two subsidiary sources of international law, case law and scholarly writing. The Court has made abundant use of such materials in its interpretation of the Convention. It has described the judgments of the International Court of Justice as being 'authoritative as regards the content of customary international law'.⁸² It has even gone somewhat further, holding that it 'must

Although it is the classic statement of the sources of international law, article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice does not provide an exhaustive list. One important source of law that is not explicitly included is jus cogens or peremptory norms. On several occasions the Court has described the prohibition of torture as a peremptory norm or jus cogens.⁹⁶ It has also recognized the prohibition of genocide as a jus cogens norm.⁹⁷ It has followed the International Court of Justice in holding that the jus cogens status of a norm does not override the immunity from suit that a State enjoys before the courts of another State.⁹⁸ In individual opinions, several judges of the Court have ventured opinions about the scope of jus cogens. The statements are almost never supported with any authority in defence of the position taken. In a separate opinion, one judge said that '[p]rohibition of discrimination has crystallised into a jus cogens norm'.⁹⁹ Another said that the prohibition against the use of force, the right to self-determination, the prohibition of genocide, and certain fundamental human rights were 'established peremptory norms' norms, but that enjoyment of possessions, economic freedom, or access to a court or tribunal, particularly in civil proceedings, were not.¹⁰⁰ Yet another described the prohibition of refoulement of refugees in this manner.¹⁰¹

Judge Dedov has spoken of 'a breach of a jus cogens rule such as the prohibition of war crimes'.¹⁰² In a very early decision of the Court, Judge Verdross said that the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies did not form part of the jus cogens rule.¹⁰³

Article 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties invites resort 'to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion'. It may either confirm the meaning reached in applying article 31, or provide its own guidance as to the meaning when article 31 leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure or leads to a result that is manifestly absurd or unreasonable. The preparatory work or travaux préparatoires of the European Convention are rather sparse, especially with respect to the definitions of fundamental rights and issues related to their interpretation and application. There can be no comparison with, for example, the drafting record of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, where records of meetings that took place over many months and hundreds of proposed amendments may be consulted. In the 1970s and 1980s, the Council of Europe published a collection of materials covering the drafting of the Convention itself and Protocol No. 1. Records of the drafting of some of the subsequent Protocols have been issued in internal Court documents.¹⁰⁴ Beginning with Protocol No. 4, the Committee of Ministers has issued an 'explanatory report' in which there are some references to debates about the formulation of certain provisions.

Despite the limited material available, the Convention organs have often cited the travaux préparatoires, generally without specifying whether this is to confirm the interpretation resulting from article 31 or to provide guidance where article 31 does not deliver an acceptable result. For example, in the interpretation of the reference to general principles of international law in article 1 of Protocol No. 1 the Court has referred in detail to the debates as well as to the resolution of the Committee of Ministers approving the final text.¹⁰⁵ Sometimes, the Court has used the travaux préparatoires in order to confirm the interpretation resulting from a literal reading of the provision in question.¹⁰⁶ In any early case, the Court refused to consider the travaux of article 5(1)(c) 'having regard to a generally recognised principle regarding the interpretation of international treaties, resort to the preparatory work', finding that the Convention text was 'clear in itself'.¹⁰⁷

The European Convention is authenticated in both English and French. Consequently, the principles of article 33 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties are relevant to its interpretation. Even before the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties had been adopted, the Court acknowledged that 'confronted with two versions of a treaty which are equally authentic but not exactly the same, the Court must, following established international law precedents, interpret them in a way that will reconcile them as far as possible'.¹⁰⁸ In subsequent judgments where discrepancies in the two texts were at issue, the Court referred to the principle set out in article 33 of the Vienna Convention.¹⁰⁹ In a recent case, it affirmed that article 33 'reflects international customary law'.¹¹⁰

In Wemhoff, the Court noted that the English version of article 5(3) could support two interpretations, one of them a narrow approach by which an unacceptable delay in criminal proceedings concerned the pre-trial period only, and the French version, where the word jugée was employed, left no doubt that the right to a speedy trial continued until the completion of the proceedings.¹¹¹ Similarly, the Court compared the rather limited scope of the notion of 'promptness' in the English text of article 5(3) with the immediacy of the French equivalent, ausitôt, concluding that the French term 'confirms that the degree of flexibility attaching to the notion of "promptness" is limited'.¹¹² In a case decided before the adoption of the Vienna Convention, the Court compared the French and English versions of article 14, but without referring to any established principle or rule of interpretation. It noted the 'very general wording' of the French text (sans distinction aucune), which does not seem to prohibit every difference of treatment, and said it must be read in light of the 'more restrictive text' of the English version ('without discrimination'). It said that the French version alone might lead to 'absurd results'.¹¹³ Addressing the meaning of gratuitement'free' in article 6(3)(e), which concerns the right to a funded interpreter in criminal trials, the Court concluded that the two terms were equivalent. Although it made reference to the relevant provisions of the Vienna Convention, this was not really an application of article 33 because there was no difference in meaning in the two authoritative texts.¹¹⁴ The right to 'adequate time' for preparation of the defence, in article 6(3)(b), is made stronger and more imperative with the word nécessaires in the French version, as the European Commission of Human Rights observed.¹¹⁵

Respect for precedent

The implied mention of case law in the reference to 'rules of international law' in article 31(3)(c) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties is not generally taken to suggest a rule of binding precedent or stare decisis. Nevertheless, the 'normal course' is to follow precedent.¹¹⁶ Certainly, the judgments of the Court are replete with citations to its earlier case law and that of the European Commission. Indeed, most judgments contain a section dealing with the general principles the Court will apply regarding a provision that is usually copied, often word for word, from earlier rulings. Obedience to precedent has been held out as dictated by 'the interests of legal certainty, foreseeability and equality before the law'.¹¹⁷ However, 'the Court is not formally bound to follow any of its previous judgments',¹¹⁸ and on occasion it is prepared to depart from precedent. It has noted that 'a failure by the Court to maintain a dynamic and evolutive approach would risk rendering it a bar to reform or improvement'.¹¹⁹

Read as a whole, promote harmony

Sometimes, the Court has insisted that 'the Convention must be read as a whole, and interpreted in such a way as to promote internal consistency and harmony between its various provisions'.¹²⁰ In Misick, the United Kingdom had withdrawn the application of article 3 of Protocol No. 1 to the Turks and Caicos Islands. The applicant, who had been an elected official in the territory, could not invoke that provision, so he based his claim on article 8. Finding the case inadmissible, the Court said 'that Article 8 should not, in principle, be interpreted in such a way as to incorporate the requirements of Article 3 of Protocol No. 1 in respect of territories to which the latter Article does not apply'.¹²¹

Nevertheless, in the case of articles 2 and 3, for many years the Court has wrestled with the tension between the two provisions, given the apparent acknowledgement of capital punishment in article 2 yet the prohibition of inhuman and degrading punishment in article 3. Eventually, the Court resolved the contradiction by considering the reference to the death penalty in article 2 to be inoperative, in light of evolving practice within the Council of Europe. Even then, it did not go so far as to hold that the death penalty was inhuman and degrading punishment, but rather condemned it as 'ill-treatment'.¹²²

Dynamic and evolutive interpretation

The European Convention is largely derived from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as the Preamble to the Convention confirms. The Declaration was itself intended as a 'common standard of achievement'. Its drafters recognized that they were setting out a programme for the development of rights rather than a rigid and definitive codification. Those who wrote the European Convention acknowledged, in the Preamble, that they were taking the 'first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration'. This initial understanding was of a dynamic body of law capable of adjusting itself to a changing environment. Therefore, and because it is 'first and foremost a system for the protection of human rights',¹²³ the Convention must be interpreted in a manner that bears in mind changing conditions and an emerging consensus as to the appropriate standards. It is 'a living instrument which must be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions and of the ideas prevailing in democratic States today'.¹²⁴

The approach to interpretation is often described as 'dynamic and evolutive'. The term 'evolutive' can be found in the Oxford English Dictionary, although it is not in very common use; the Court seems to have imported it from the French évolutive. In one sense, such a dynamic and evolutive approach is not interpretation at all. It amounts to judicial law making, albeit an authority that finds its justification in an interpretation of the Convention. It is not dissimilar from what is allowed and even expected in constitutional interpretation within domestic systems. It is recognized that a measure of judicial initiative is mandated by the nature of constitutional documents that have often been drafted long ago and that are difficult to alter. Nevertheless, the boldness of allowing an international court to adjust the scope of an international agreement reached by a large number of sovereign states, without their explicit consent and without allowing them the possibility of reservation to such changes, cannot be gainsaid.

It is a quite unprecedented development in international law, and one to which there was some initial resistance. Judge Fitzmaurice objected, noting that the Convention and other human rights treaties had made 'heavy inroads on some of the most cherished preserves of governments in the sphere of their domestic jurisdiction or domaine réservé'. He said this 'could justify even a somewhat restrictive interpretation of the Convention but, without going as far as that, they must be said, unquestionably, not only to justify, but positively to demand, a cautious and conservative interpretation, particularly as regards any provisions the meaning of which may be uncertain, and where extensive constructions might have the effect of imposing upon the contracting States obligations they had not really meant to assume, or would not have understood themselves to be assuming'.¹²⁵ In a recent decision, several judges cautioned against too much judicial activism. Noting that that 'the point of the evolutive interpretation, as conceived by the Court, is to accompany and even channel change' they said 'it is not to anticipate change, still less to try to impose it'.¹²⁶

To the claim that evolutive or dynamic interpretation is required by the nature of the European Convention, it can be answered that amendment mechanisms exist. The proof can be seen in the seventeen Protocols to the Convention that have been adopted over the years. In 1989, the Court rejected the proposal that it should deem out-dated and inoperative the reference to capital punishment in article 2(1) of the Convention. It noted the adoption of Protocol No. 6 to the Convention, explaining that 'as a subsequent written agreement [it] shows that the intention of the Contracting Parties as recently as 1983 was to adopt the normal method of amendment of the text in order to introduce a new obligation to abolish capital punishment in time of peace and, what is more, to do so by an optional instrument allowing each State to choose the moment when to undertake such an engagement'.¹²⁷

But where there is no protocol to obstruct such judicial innovation, judges of the Court are capable of great creativity. In Scopolla, for example, they agreed that despite the silence of article 7(1) on a right of a person to benefit from a favourable change in an applicable penalty by comparison with what was in force when the offence was committed, 'a consensus has gradually emerged in Europe and internationally around the view that application of a criminal law providing for a more lenient penalty, even one enacted after the commission of the offence, has become a fundamental principle of criminal law'.¹²⁸ Dissenting judges objected that this amounted to re-writing article 7 and that it 'oversteps the limits'.¹²⁹ They invoked an injunction from a ruling in the mid-1980s that 'the Court cannot, by means of an evolutive interpretation, derive from these instruments a right that was not included therein at the outset'.¹³⁰ But that is most certainly what it does. If decades ago judges might have been concerned that such judicial activism would discourage ratification or promote denunciation of the Convention, history has shown this not to be the case.

Principle of effectiveness

The provisions of an international treaty such as the Convention must be construed in the light of their object and purpose and also in accordance with the principle of effectiveness.¹³¹ Hersch Lauterpacht explained that the principle of effectiveness, which he also described as 'liberal interpretation', was the opposite of strict interpretation of treaty obligations.¹³²

In Klass, the Court invoked 'the effectiveness (l'effet utile) of the Convention' when interpreting former article 25, now repealed, governing access to the European Commission of Human Rights.¹³³ Sometimes it is invoked as a general principle underpinning the Convention, rather than as a canon of interpretation: 'To ensure that human rights do not become a mere mirage, the most protective interpretation of the Convention's rights and freedoms is required: to guarantee real, not virtual, independence of the judicial power and an effet utile, not apparent, of the rights and freedoms of the Convention, it is indispensable that the Court be vested with the implied power to oversee the execution of its judgments, and, if need be, to contradict a decision of the Committee of Ministers in this regard.'¹³⁴

CONVENTION FOR THE PROTECTION
FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

CONVENTION OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Preamble/Préambule

The governments signatory hereto, being members of the Council of Europe,

Considering the Universal Declaration of Human Rights proclaimed by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 10th December 1948;

Considering that this Declaration aims at securing the universal and effective recognition and observance of the Rights therein declared;

Considering that the aim of the Council of Europe is the achievement of greater unity between its members and that one of the methods by which that aim is to be pursued is the maintenance and further realisation of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

Reaffirming their profound belief in those fundamental freedoms which are the foundation of justice and peace in the world and are best maintained on the one hand by an effective political democracy and on the other by a common understanding and observance of the human rights upon which they depend;

Being resolved, as the governments of European countries which are like-minded and have a common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law, to take the first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration,

Affirming that the High Contracting Parties, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, have the primary responsibility to secure the rights and freedoms defined in this Convention and the Protocols thereto, and that in doing so they enjoy a margin of appreciation, subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights established by this Convention,¹

Have agreed as follows:

Les Gouvernements signataires, membres du Conseil de l'Europe,

Considérant la Déclaration universelle des droits de l'homme, proclamée par l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies le 10 décembre 1948;

Considérant que cette déclaration tend à assurer la reconnaissance et l'application universelles et effectives des droits qui y sont énoncés;

Considérant que le but du Conseil de l'Europe est de réaliser une union plus étroite entre ses membres, et que l'un des moyens d'atteindre ce but est la sauvegarde et le développement des droits de l'homme et des libertés fondamentales;

Réaffirmant leur profond attachement à ces libertés fondamentales qui constituent les assises mêmes de la justice et de la paix dans le monde et dont le maintien repose essentiellement sur un régime politique véritablement démocratique, d'une part, et, d'autre part, sur une conception commune et un commun respect des droits de l'homme dont ils se réclament;

Résolus, en tant que gouvernements d'Etats européens animés d'un même esprit et possédant un patrimoine commun d'idéal et de traditions politiques, de respect de la liberté et de prééminence du droit, à prendre les premières mesures propres à assurer la garantie collective de certains des droits énoncés dans la Déclaration universelle,

Affirmant qu'il incombe au premier chef aux Hautes Parties contractantes, conformément au principe de subsidiarité, de garantir le respect des droits et libertés définis dans la présente Convention et ses protocoles, et que, ce faisant, elles jouissent d'une marge d'appréciation, sous le contrôle de la Cour européenne des Droits de l'Homme instituée par la présente Convention,

Sont convenus de ce qui suit:

Introductory comments

One of the earliest decisions of the European Commission of Human Rights reviewed the Preamble of the Convention and concluded:

[I]t clearly appears from these pronouncements that the purpose of the High Contracting parties in concluding the Convention was not to concede to each other reciprocal rights and obligations in pursuance of their individual national interests but to realise the aims and ideals of the Council of Europe, as expressed in its Statute, and to establish a common public order of the free democracies of Europe with the object of safeguarding their common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law...²

The Commission promised that the Preamble would inspire the case law of the Convention organs. Actually, the Preamble of the European Convention on Human Rights has been referred to only sporadically in the case law of the Commission and the Court, and by academic commentators. Many works of analysis of the Convention begin abruptly with article 1, as if the Preamble did not exist at all. The Court's website enables users to search the case law according to the provision of the Convention, but reference to the Preamble does not seem to be contemplated.

Yet the preamble is an important component of treaties, often consuming considerable energy when the instrument is being drafted. It provides an opportunity to add texture and nuance, to place the treaty within its historical context, and to offer guides for interpreters in the future. For that reason, there is an explicit reference to the preamble in the 'General rule of interpretation' set out in article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties: 'The context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble...'³ Although the Vienna Convention was drafted many years after the European Convention, and it is not binding upon all States Parties, the European Court has nevertheless made reference to its provisions on interpretation on many occasions.⁴ Indeed, noting the provision in the Vienna Convention, it has described the Preamble as being 'generally very useful for the determination of the "object" and "purpose" of the instrument to be construed'.⁵

What better indication of the importance of the Convention's Preamble is there than its amendment with the addition of a paragraph in accordance with Protocol No. 15? It is an exceedingly unusual development for the preamble of a treaty to be amended in this manner. That the Committee of Ministers deemed it useful and important to modify the Preamble attests to its significance within the general law of the Convention.

The European Court has referred to the preambles of other treaties as bases for their interpretation, including the Charter of the United Nations,⁶ the Statute of the Council

Jann Kleffner has pointed out that nothing in the law of treaties suggests that provisions of the preamble have an inferior legal force to other provisions or no legal force whatsoever.¹⁵ According to Charles Rousseau, '[o]n a parfois considéré le préambule des traités comme doué d'une force obligatoire inférieure à celle du dispositif. Mais c'est là une opinion isolée'.¹⁶

Drafting of the provision

The initial draft of the European Convention on Human Rights was prepared by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement, chaired by Pierre-Henri Teitgen, with David Maxwell Fyfe and Fernand Dehousse as rapporteurs. Both Maxwell Fyfe and Dehousse had been involved in the drafting of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights the previous year. The text they proposed for the European Convention began with a four-paragraph preamble.

The States Parties to this Convention, members of the Council of Europe, wishing:

To preserve the moral values and democratic principles which are their common heritage,

To assure the rule of law and to guarantee human rights and fundamental freedoms in accordance with Article 3 of the Statute of the Council of Europe,

To ensure by progressive measures the universal application of the Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations,

The draft formed the basis of discussions at the first session of the Consultative Assembly, in 1949, but there was no consideration of the proposed preamble. The Recommendation to the Committee of Ministers adopted by the Assembly did not contain a preamble.¹⁸

The idea of a preamble seems to have been revived during the second session of the Consultative Assembly, in 1950, by Lord Layton, one of the British members of the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions. Referring to the debate about inclusion or exclusion of certain rights from the Convention itself, Lord Layton suggested that there be a preamble 'in which it would be pointed out that all the Member States accepted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights'. In the proposed preamble of the Convention, the distinction, important in the eyes of many members, could be drawn between human rights in general and those particular rights which should be safeguarded internationally. The Preamble could also specify that the aim of the Convention was to ensure a common responsibility which covered human rights as far as possible, and would point out clearly that what had been done was only a beginning and that later on this Convention should be extended to cover a wider field.¹⁹

The drafting of the Convention's Preamble began with a proposal from Mr Mitchison of the United Kingdom, submitted mid-way through the second session of the Parliamentary Assembly, which was held in August 1950:

Insert in the draft a preamble worded as follows:

'Whereas the Members of the General Assembly of the United Nations have proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights approved by the General Assembly on 10 December 1948;

And whereas that Declaration was proclaimed to the end, among others, that every organ of society should by progressive measures, national and international, strive to secure the universal and effective recognition and observance of the rights therein declared, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction;

And whereas the High Contracting Parties are the Governments of European countries, like-minded and having a common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law, and accordingly are in a position to take a first step towards the collective enforcement of certain of the Rights stated in the Universal Declaration and to restate them in a form suitable for that purpose;

And whereas the aim of the Council of Europe is the achievement of greater unity between its Members, who are the High Contracting Parties, and one of the methods by which that aim is to be pursued is by agreement and common action in legal and administrative matters and in the maintenance and further realisation of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

Now therefore the High Contracting Parties, reaffirming their profound belief in those fundamental freedoms which are the foundation of justice and peace in the world and are best maintained on the one hand by an effective political democracy and on the other by a common understanding and observance of the Human Rights upon which they depend,

The text was adopted without change by the Drafting Sub-Committee, which 'strongly urge[d] the Committee of Ministers to complete or modify the text' by its addition.²¹

The Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions said it was 'unanimously felt that a preamble in suitable terms would be a fitting beginning to the Convention . . .'²² When the rapporteur of the Committee, David Maxwell Fyfe, presented the report to the Consultative Assembly on 25 August 1950, he explained in some detail the additions and amendments that were being proposed, with the exception of the Preamble, about which he was silent.²³ Indeed, during the general debate on the Committee's report, which focused upon the right to property and to education, there was not the slightest mention of the Preamble. The President of the Assembly proposed a vote on the report, but was interrupted on a point of order by Mr Mitchison of the United Kingdom, who drew attention to the Preamble.²⁴ Mitchison said that he hoped it would not be stymied by a question of procedure, noting that 'the Preamble is wholly non-contentious, and that it would be fitting to the dignity of the instrument and the dignity of this Assembly that something of the sort should be stated in the proposed Convention'.²⁵ Without further comment on the substance, the Preamble was adopted.²⁶

A significantly revised version appeared in the draft prepared by the Secretariat; it bears no date, but presumably was issued in September or October 1950:

The Governments signatory hereto, being Members of the Council of Europe, democracy and on the other by a common understanding and observance of the Human Rights upon which they depend;

Have agreed as follows:²⁷

In a subsequent exchange of notes between officials in the Secretariat, a question was raised about the formulation in the final phrase: 'Have agreed as follows'. H.T. Adam explained: 'There cannot, of course, be any question of deleting the Preamble to which the Assembly attaches some importance.'²⁸ The Secretariat proposed that the Preamble begin with the phrase 'The Governments signatory hereto, being Members of the Council of Europe' but without listing the governments by name. This would 'make it possible for certain Governments, if they wish, to sign the Convention as original signatories, even though they are unable to sign on the date of formal signature in Rome...'²⁹

The Committee of Legal Experts, in light of the recommendations of the Secretariat, made final changes during the Sixth Session of the Committee of Ministers in Rome on 2–3 November 1950.³⁰ A resolution of the Committee of Ministers noted the adoption of the text of the Convention 'adding to it a Preamble in conformity with the proposals of the Assembly'.³¹ Several weeks later, when an angry Consultative Assembly protested the omission of many of its proposals in the final version of the Convention, Mitchison recalled that 'there was one little thing which went through, I believe, without a dissentient voice—just a small preamble'. He added: 'What importance is there in preambles? Only that in this case it did in its terms treat this Convention as a first step. We said so; the Committee of Ministers accepted it.'³²

The heading 'Preamble' was added pursuant to Protocol No. 11.³³

The sixth recital of the Preamble, introducing the concepts of subsidiarity and margin of appreciation, is the result of Protocol No. 15.³⁴ The origin of this unusual initiative is the Brighton Declaration, adopted in April 2012 by the High Level Conference on the Future of the European Court of Human Rights: 'The Conference therefore... Concludes that, for reasons of transparency and accessibility, a reference to the principle of subsidiarity and the doctrine of the margin of appreciation as developed in the Court's case law should be included in the Preamble to the Convention and invites the Committee of Ministers to adopt the necessary amending instrument by the end of 2013, while recalling the States Parties' commitment to give full effect to their obligation to secure the rights and freedoms defined in the Convention.'³⁵

Analysis and interpretation

'The governments signatory hereto ...'

The Preamble begins with the words the 'governments signatory hereto'. In fact, signature is only a preliminary act to the acceptance of the obligations in the Convention, which involves ratification or accession in accordance with article 59. The Preamble reads as if it is a declaration by the twelve founding members of the Council of Europe. They were the States that negotiated the text of the Convention. This may be confirmed by the signature clause at the very end of the Convention: 'Done at Rome this 4th day of November 1950, in English and French, both texts being equally authentic, in a single copy which shall remain deposited in the archives of the Council of Europe. The Secretary General shall transmit certified copies to each of the signatories.'

The signing ceremony took place on 4 November 1950 at the Barberini Palace in Rome. It sits at one end of the Via Rasella, the site of a famous ambush of Nazi soldiers by young partisans that provoked a notorious reprisal, now memorialized at the Fosse Ardeatine on the outskirts of the city.³⁶ The French Foreign Minister Robert Schuman had told the Committee of Ministers that he 'was anxious that the Convention should be signed in Rome, the historic city which had been the cradle of Europe [sic] civilisation, particularly as the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights had been proclaimed in Paris in 1948'.³⁷ The date of signature itself—technically, the date when the instrument became open for signature—is given no particular legal significance in the Convention itself. The Convention did not in fact enter into force for three more years, after obtaining the requisite number of ratifications. Nevertheless, the date of 4 November 1950 was fixed by the Grand Chamber as the effective date for the beginning of the legal order established by the Convention. The Grand Chamber said this was when the Convention 'began its existence as an international human rights treaty'.³⁸ The Court did this in order to establish a jurisdictional boundary, denying the admissibility of claims relating to the procedural obligation under articles 2 and 3 of the Convention to the extent that the substantive violation of fundamental rights took place prior to 4 November 1950.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (recitals 1, 2, and 5)

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is referred to three times in the Preamble of the Convention, in recitals 1, 2, and 5. The European Convention is the first human rights treaty to invoke the Universal Declaration in its Preamble, beginning a practice that became very common in modern human rights law.³⁹ For example, such references also appear in treaties of the universal system adopted under the aegis of the United Nations, notably the two Covenants on human rights,⁴⁰ as well as in regional instruments like the American Convention on Human Rights⁴¹ and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights.⁴² The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is not, however, mentioned in the preambles of the Protocols to the European Convention.

Most of the preambular references in human rights treaties are nothing more than perfunctory acknowledgements of the ancestry of international human rights norms. The references in the Preamble of the European Convention cannot be dismissed in the same way. They convey significant nuances of meaning that may impact upon the interpretation of the Convention as a whole. Of the provisions in the European Convention that concern the content of human rights, the majority can trace their lineage to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Convention's Preamble stands out as an exception in this respect. Although making three references to the Declaration, the Preamble of the Convention echoes that of the Universal Declaration in only a limited manner. In particular, the reference to 'the foundation of justice and peace in the world' in recital 4 is inspired by the text of recital 1 of the Preamble of the Declaration. The Preamble of the Convention is considerably shorter than that of the Declaration (175 words, compared with 320 words). One way to understand this is that the Convention was meant to incorporate by reference the ideas in the Declaration. Yet the Convention's specifically European focus, which is not so subtly communicated in the Preamble, might also be taken as a message that rights were perhaps not understood in the same way everywhere in the world, or even within Europe itself.

The first recital is comparable to what appears more generally in human rights treaties. It simply acknowledges the Declaration as having been 'proclaimed' by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 10 December 1948. After its own lengthy Preamble, the Declaration states:

The General Assembly,

Proclaims this Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 10 December 1948. That year its meetings were held in Paris, the first and only time a full regular session of the General Assembly took place outside of New York. Most of the States that were to establish the Council of Europe the following May were present and active in the debate on the text of the Universal Declaration as full members of the United Nations. Two of the ten founding members of the Council of Europe, Ireland and Italy, were not involved in drafting the Universal Declaration and only joined the United Nations in 1955. The pre-eminent European in the discussions was the French jurist, René Cassin. Two decades later, when he was serving as president of the European Court of Human Rights, Cassin received the Nobel Peace Prize in recognition of his contribution to the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

⁴² African Charter on Human and People's Rights, (1986) 1520 UNTS 217, preamble, recital 3.

The Universal Declaration was intended to be one part of a larger ensemble of instruments known collectively as the International Bill of Rights. The Bill was to contain a manifesto or declaration, but also a fully fledged treaty (or covenant) and provision for means of enforcement. In 1948, the General Assembly found itself divided on whether to proceed with this project in a piecemeal fashion, given that the draft Universal Declaration was in more or less final form, whereas the other two components of the International Bill of Rights had yet to find an adequate degree of consensus. Over some resistance, and at the urging of individuals like Cassin, the Assembly agreed to adopt the Universal Declaration with a view to returning, the following year, to the draft covenant and the means of enforcement. There was concern that the postponement would become permanent. A belief that the United Nations would be unable to complete the International Bill of Rights may have compelled some States to push for adoption of the European Convention. In fact, the United Nations General Assembly took nearly two decades more on the project. In 1966, it adopted the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights, together with an Optional Protocol providing for individual petitions concerning civil and political rights. These instruments entered into force a decade later. An Optional Protocol authorizing individual petitions concerning economic, social, and cultural rights only entered into force in 2013.⁴³

To a great extent, the drafting of the European Convention took place in the wake of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe responsible for the first working draft of the Convention, in September 1949, satisfied itself with a summary text that referred to the relevant provisions of the Universal Declaration. In the report of the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions to the Consultative Assembly, on 5 September 1949, rapporteur Pierre-Henri Teitgen said that:

... the Committee considered that it was preferable (as much from a desire to co-ordinate the activity of the Council of Europe with that of the United Nations, as by reason of the moral authority and technical value of the document in question) to make use, as far as possible, of the definitions set out in the 'Universal Declaration of Human Rights' approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations. It thus based itself, as far as possible, on this document.⁴⁴

Speaking to the Assembly, Teitgen added that the Committee also sought 'to avoid making a distinction between European and world order'.⁴⁵

Later, it was felt preferable that the formulations of rights and not only the titles or headings found in the Declaration should be incorporated within the text of the European Convention. The final version of the Convention manifests the influence of the Universal Declaration in many provisions, yet there is no single article that merely reproduces the corresponding text of the Declaration. In some cases, such as the right to life (art. 2), the Declaration provides a succinct statement ('everyone shall have the right to life...'), whereas the Convention offers a detailed codification and an enumeration of exceptions.

In others, such as the prohibition of torture and ill treatment (art. 3), the two texts are virtually identical as drafted and probably equivalent in terms of their legal content.

The second recital of the Preamble states that the Declaration 'aims at securing the universal and effective recognition and observance of the Rights therein declared'. The words are taken almost literally from the introductory paragraph of the Declaration. The bulk of the introductory paragraph of the Declaration is addressed to its legal and political significance ('a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations'), to those for whom the Declaration is destined ('every individual and every organ of society') and to the means of implementation ('by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures'). By its very nature, these notions did not really apply to the European Convention. It was a binding treaty, addressed to States, with its own legal enforcement mechanisms.

In a concurring opinion, Judge Bonello of the European Court of Human Rights described these words as the Convention's 'agenda heralded in its preamble'. Arguing for an extensive approach to territorial jurisdiction of the Convention, he said that "Universal" hardly suggests an observance parcelled off by territory on the checkerboard of geography'.⁴⁶ His words echo those of Léopold Senghor, the Senegalese poet and political leader who participated in the drafting of the Convention on behalf of France. Senghor objected to article 56 whereby the Convention did not automatically extend to subject territories and colonies of the European States. Senghor noted that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights asserted explicitly, in article 2(2), that 'no distinction shall be made on the basis on [sic] the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty'. In excluding this principle, the Council of Europe would 'transform the European Declaration of Human Rights into the Declaration of European Human Rights', he said.⁴⁷

The fifth recital sets out the intention of the 'likeminded' governments of European countries 'to take the first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the Rights stated in the Universal Declaration' (les premières mesures propres à assurer la garantie collective de certains des droits énoncés dans la Déclaration universelle). The Convention was understood to represent an initial effort at rendering the Declaration enforceable. Although the Universal Declaration was an inspiring and hortatory document, it did not contemplate any international measures for enforcement. During the preparatory work in the Council of Europe the significance of establishing mechanisms for collective enforcement of the Universal Declaration was highlighted. For example, the Belgian Henri Rolin explained that in adopting the European Convention, the Council of Europe would 'have substituted a clearly categorical text for the Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations Organisation, of which, all too often, the Governments feel justified in emphasising the so-called purely moral scope, neither juridical nor mandatory'.⁴⁸

The final paragraph of the Preamble also highlights the fact that the implementation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is not meant to be comprehensive. The Convention incorporates 'certain' rights included in the Declaration and thereby excludes many others, being 'selective in the protection it affords'.⁴⁹ During the drafting of the European Convention, the point was often made that the document was not intended to reproduce all of the rights in the Universal Declaration. There was very much the sense that the Convention represented an initial effort in a difficult and innovative area. It should be minimalist in scope so as to ensure adoption. Sometimes, the drafters were urged to drop one or another right from the list because it was suggested that the right was not important enough.

The most significant omission is the entire category of economic, social, and cultural rights. These had been set out in articles 22 to 27 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, although there was no formal heading or rubric distinguishing them from the other rights. After much debate, the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe agreed to postpone consideration of economic, social, and cultural rights as a category. In two areas where the boundary between civil and political rights and economic, social, and cultural rights is difficult to define, the drafters of the European Convention continued to consider the inclusion: the right to property and the right of parents to determine the education of their children. These were recognized in Protocol No. 1, agreed to shortly after the Convention itself was adopted. Issues at the core of economic, social, and cultural rights such as the right to medical care, to housing, and to appropriate working conditions have to a large extent remained outside the scope of the Convention and its Protocols. They arise, although somewhat indirectly, in cases dealing with the right to property under article 1 of Protocol No. 1, and the right to equality under article 14 of the Convention and article 1 of Protocol No. 12.⁵⁰ Of course, they are addressed in other instruments of the Council of Europe. Discussing the 'flawed argument' that 'the founding fathers intended to recognise in the Convention only civil and political rights', Judge Pinto de Albuquerque said that this 'ignore[d] the purpose of the Convention as a treaty which envisages the "development" of human rights in the light of the Universal Declaration on [sic] Human Rights, where economic and social rights are foreseen'.⁵¹

Differences between the European Convention and the Universal Declaration have given rise to judicial comment. For example, the European Court has explained that the absence of an express reference to human trafficking in article 4 is unsurprising given that the Convention was inspired by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which itself makes no reference to the term.⁵² The Court has also noted that although article 14(1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognizes the right of everyone 'to seek and enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution', there is no reflection of this provision in the European Convention.⁵³

The drafters of the European Convention clearly decided not to include a provision based on article 20(2) of the Universal Declaration to the effect that 'no one may be compelled to belong to an association'. The Conference of Senior Officials deliberately excluded this in order to shelter the closed shop system that then prevailed in several Council of Europe member States.⁵⁴ This passage has generated much debate and no consensus among members of the Court.⁵⁵ Judge Þór Vilhjálmsson explained that the issue was of 'particular significance' because of the preambular reference to the Universal Declaration, and the idea that the aim of the Convention was to take 'the first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration'. He said that the travaux préparatoires of the Convention showed a reluctance to include the negative freedom of association at that time and that '[n]one of the ten protocols has changed that situation'.⁵⁶

Article 12 of the Convention, dealing with the right to marry, provides a similar example. When it was being drafted, the rapporteur of the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions of the Consultative Assembly explained that article 16(1) of the Universal Declaration had been incorporated in the draft but not the subsequent paragraphs 'concerning equal rights after marriage, since we only guarantee the right to marry'.⁵⁷ As the Court has held, 'the travaux préparatoires disclose no intention to include in Article 12 (art. 12) any guarantee of a right to have the ties of marriage dissolved by divorce'.⁵⁸ The Court has described the omission of the right to divorce from article 12 as 'deliberate'.⁵⁹

The Universal Declaration also provides, in article 21(2), for the right of everyone to equal access to public service. There is nothing equivalent in the European Convention or the Protocols. Noting that the matter had been considered during the drafting of Protocol No. 7, the Court said this was not a chance omission, adding that 'as the Preamble to the Convention states, they are designed to ensure the collective enforcement of "certain" of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration'.⁶⁰

It is commonly said that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is 'non-binding', in contrast with the subsequent treaties like the European Convention, where its significance is acknowledged in the Preamble. This rather trite formulation does not do justice to the role the Universal Declaration of Human Rights has played and continues to play in defining the international law of human rights. There can be no doubt that, unlike many of the human rights treaties, the Universal Declaration contains no enforcement mechanisms. Yet it has established the nomenclature of human rights, framed the debate and set the priorities for an increasingly elaborate system of law of which it can be said to be the touchstone. The enduring significance of the Universal Declaration is confirmed by its inclusion as one of the bases of the Universal Periodic Review, today among the primary monitoring activities of the United Nations Human Rights Council.⁶¹

In its interpretation of the provisions of the European Convention, the European Court of Human Rights takes into account 'any relevant rules and principles of international law applicable in relations between the Contracting Parties' with a view that 'the Convention should so far as possible be interpreted in harmony with other rules of international law of which it forms part'.⁶² In this context, it has made reference to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.⁶³ This suggests that the Declaration is more than a 'non-binding' statement of moral principles. Rather, it is a source of 'relevant rules and principles of international law' and part of the general international law framework to which the Convention belongs.

The aim of the Council of Europe (recital 3)

Recital 3 of the Preamble makes an association between 'the aim of the Council of Europe', which is described as 'the achievement of greater unity between its members', and the 'maintenance and further realisation of human rights and fundamental freedoms'. The latter is said to be one of the methods of achieving the aim. The paragraph echoes the language in the Statute of the Council of Europe. Article 1 of that instrument declares: 'The aim of the Council is to achieve a greater unity between its Members, for the purpose of safeguarding and realising the ideals and principles which are their common heritage.' Article 3 states: 'Every Member of the Council of Europe must accept the principles of the rule of law and of the enjoyment by all persons within its jurisdiction of human rights and fundamental freedoms . . .'. Compliance with this provision is a condition of membership, and serious breach is a ground for suspension.

It has been suggested that recital 3 of the Preamble, with its reference to 'achievement of greater unity between its members' underscores the erga omnes character of the Convention.⁶⁴ In Loizidou, the Court considered that a restrictive interpretation of the optional clauses recognizing the jurisdiction of the Commission and the Court that were then still in force might 'run counter to the aim, as expressed in the Preamble to the Convention, to achieve greater unity in the maintenance and further realisation of human rights'.⁶⁵ For Judge Wojtyczek, the 'further realisation of human rights and fundamental freedoms . . . it implies that the actors of this task are the national governments. It refers to only one instrument for this purpose, namely the conclusion of treaties.’⁶⁶ He described this ‘further realisation’ as ‘a tool for the achievement of greater unity between the member States of the Council of Europe’.⁶⁷

Referring to the expression ‘maintenance and further realisation’, Judge Tulkens cited the Wemhoff case as authority for the notion that as a ‘law-making treaty’ the Convention mandates ‘the interpretation that is most appropriate in order to realise the aim and achieve the object of the treaty, not that which would restrict to the greatest possible degree the obligations undertaken by the Parties’.⁶⁸ She wrote: “Maintenance” requires the Court to ensure in particular that the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention continue to be effective in changing circumstances. “Further realisation” allows for a degree of innovation and creativity, which may extend the scope of the Convention guarantees.⁶⁹

Justice and peace (recital 4)

In recital 4 of the Preamble, the signatory States ‘[r]eaffirm[. . .] their profound belief in those fundamental freedoms which are the foundation of justice and peace in the world’. The phrase is obviously inspired by recital 1 of the Preamble to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: ‘Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world.’⁷⁰ The travaux préparatoires do not indicate why other important concepts, such as human dignity and freedom were not repeated in the Convention and to attempt some explanation is probably a hazardous exercise. Perhaps it was merely an effort at concision. According to Jean-Paul Costa, one explanation could be that ‘the Convention is a more practical, pragmatic, and mechanism-oriented text than that of the Declaration’.⁷¹ The importance of human dignity within the overall vision of human rights has been enhanced by its recognition in article 1 of the European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights: ‘Human dignity is inviolable. It must be respected and protected.’⁷² The absence of a reference to ‘dignity’ in the European Convention has not prevented the Convention organs from invoking the concept, notably with respect to article 3.⁷³ The Court has said that '[c]he very essence of the Convention is respect for human dignity and human freedom'.⁷⁴

Recital 4 contains the Convention's only reference to 'peace'. Although there has been much activity aimed at recognizing a 'right to peace', either as a human right or a 'peoples' right',⁷⁵ in human rights instruments the issue is generally consigned to preambular allusions. There is no quarrel with the proposition that the promotion and protection of human rights require peace. Where difficulties arise is in determining when and under what conditions the interests of promoting peace may to some extent override individual rights. For example, in the name of resolving violent armed conflicts, amnesty and similar measures may be granted. However, this plainly conflicts with the right of victims to justice, recognized in the procedural obligations associated with articles 2 and 3 of the European Convention. Such issues have only very infrequently confronted the European Court of Human Rights.⁷⁶ Referring to the preambular reference, a Chamber of the Court accepted that 'ensuring respect for human rights represents an important contribution to achieving international peace', but went on to affirm the 'unique' and 'primary responsibility' of the United Nations Security Council in this area.⁷⁷

In Sejdić and Finci, the Grand Chamber considered provisions of the Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina that had, in effect, been part of a peace agreement ending the armed conflict of the early 1990s. A contested component of the settlement was a discriminatory provision that prevented persons of certain ethnicities from being elected as the head of State. When the Grand Chamber concluded that this was a violation of the Convention, dissenting Judge Bonello warned that the Court had 'not found a hazard of civil war, the avoidance of carnage or the safeguard of territorial cohesion to have sufficient social value to justify some limitation on the rights of the two applicants'. He concluded: 'I cannot endorse a Court that sows ideals and harvests massacre'.⁷⁸ In its consideration of the permissibility of amnesty as an exception to the general principle of accountability for serious violations of human rights, the Grand Chamber acknowledged this might be legitimate if accompanied by measures of reparation or reconciliation but stopped short of recognizing the role amnesty may play in achieving a peaceful resolution of violent conflict.⁷⁹

Effective political democracy (recital 4)

According to recital 4 of the Preamble, fundamental freedoms 'are best maintained on the one hand by an effective political democracy'. The association between the protection of human rights and political democracy is underscored by several provisions of the Convention and the Protocols, notably those dealing with freedom of expression, freedom of association and peaceful assembly, and electoral rights. The notion of 'democratic society' also appears in many clauses of the Convention and the Protocols as a concept guiding the determination of restrictions or limitations on fundamental rights. Referring to recital 4 of the Preamble, the Court has said that '[s]ince it enshrines a characteristic principle of democracy, Article 3 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-3) is accordingly of prime importance in the Convention system'.⁸²

As the Grand Chamber has explained, '[d]emocracy constitutes a fundamental element of the "European public order". That is apparent, first, from the Preamble to the Convention, which establishes a very clear connection between the Convention and democracy'.⁸³ As the Court has often explained, the Convention was designed to maintain and promote the ideals and values of a democratic society. For this reason, 'democracy is the only political model contemplated by the Convention and, accordingly, the only one compatible with it'.⁸⁴ The Convention was designed to maintain and promote the ideals and values of a democratic society.⁸⁵ But there have actually only been a few references in the Court's jurisprudence to this portion of the Preamble.⁸⁶ In a dissenting opinion, Judge Wojtyczek said that this preambular provision expressed the idea that '[d]emocracy and rights are thus not seen to collide but rather to be in a symbiotic relationship with each other. The wording used may be understood, especially when read in conjunction with Article 3 of Protocol No. 1, as justifying a presumption in favour of broad powers of national legislatures'.⁸⁷

Common understanding and observance of human rights (recital 4)

In addition to 'effective political democracy', recital 5 of the Preamble indicates that fundamental freedoms are also 'best maintained' by 'a common understanding and observance of the human rights upon which they depend'. The nomenclature is of interest, because 'human rights' and 'fundamental freedoms' are often used synonymously. For example, article 1(3) of the Charter of the United Nations refers to 'encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms'. The expression is used in the same way in recital 7 of the Preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The United Nations instruments may have added the notion of 'freedoms' to 'rights' in homage to President Roosevelt, who first advanced the idea of the 'four freedoms' in his January 1941 address to the American Congress. What is intriguing about recital 5 of the Preamble of the European Convention is its suggestion that 'fundamental freedoms' depend upon 'human rights', thereby suggesting that they are not exactly synonymous, but rather bound in some symbiotic relationship.

In a case concerning article 6(1), Judge Lagergren argued for what he called an 'autonomous' interpretation of the Convention, meaning an approach to terms that is independent of what is given to them in different national legal orders. He warned of the danger that human rights be interpreted differently from State to State, arguing instead for 'a uniform interpretation, resulting, in the words of the Preamble to the Convention, in "a common understanding and observance of the human rights" protected'.⁸⁸ Judge Wojtyczek referred to the phrase, noting that '[t]he Convention should therefore be construed in a way which reflects the common understanding of human rights among the High Contracting Parties. The Court should try to avoid imposing an interpretation which goes against that common understanding.'⁸⁹

Common heritage (recital 5)

Recital 5 notes that the governments of Europe are both 'like-minded' and that they 'have a common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law'. The term 'common heritage' is an allusion to article 1 of the Statute of the Council of Europe: 'The aim of the Council is to achieve a greater unity between its Members, for the purpose of safeguarding and realising the ideals and principles which are their common heritage.' Taken as a whole, recital 5 has been described as 'the most significant passage' of the Preamble.⁹⁰ The context of adoption might have prompted the drafters to make some reference to the Second World War, but there is nothing of the kind in the Preamble. There is a striking contrast with the Preamble of the Charter of the United Nations, which speaks of 'the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind'. However, there is no explicit reference to the Second World War in the Preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Indeed, the impression delivered by paragraph 5 of the Preamble is one of political harmony within Europe, which was, of course, very far from the case in the recent past as well as the time when the Convention was being adopted. The imprecise reference to 'like-minded' cleverly avoids indicating that there were many states in Europe that were not in fact of the same mind on major issues of rights, freedoms, and social policies. The reference to a 'common heritage' in the Preamble also serves as a reminder that despite the claim that the Convention was promoting the universal values of the United Nations Universal Declaration, it may also have been reinforcing a view of cultural relativism.

According to the Grand Chamber, '[t]his common heritage consists in the underlying values of the Convention'.⁹¹ The first embodiment of the common heritage is often found in national constitutions.⁹² The Grand Chamber has said that '[i]t would hardly be compatible with the "common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law" to which the Preamble refers, were a Contracting State knowingly to surrender a person to another State where there were substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.⁹³

In Tyrer v. The United Kingdom, the Court rejected an argument based upon the claim that the local population of the Isle of Man was not outraged by corporal punishment. The Court found it noteworthy that 'in the great majority of the member States of the Council of Europe, judicial corporal punishment is not, it appears, used and, indeed, in some of them, has never existed in modern times'. It went on to note that '[t]he Isle of Man not only enjoys long-established and highly-developed political, social and cultural traditions but is an up-to-date society. Historically, geographically and culturally, the Island has always been included in the European family of nations and must be regarded as sharing fully that "common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law" to which the Preamble to the Convention refers'.⁹⁴

In a partly dissenting opinion, Judge Wojtyczek noted the role of recital 5 in interpretation of the Convention, stating: 'The same idea may also be expressed in slightly different words: the interpretation of the Convention should take into due account the common European constitutional heritage. The paradigm of European constitutionalism is an inescapable point of reference for interpretation of the Convention'.⁹⁵ In another opinion, he said that '[t]he common European constitutional heritage co-determines the meaning and the scope of the Convention rights'.⁹⁶

Rule of law (recital 5)

The allusion to a 'common heritage' in recital 5 of the Preamble concludes with a reference to the rule of law. It may be the most important concept within the entire Preamble. The words echo a provision in the Preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: 'Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law . . .' The Statute of the Council of Europe also refers to the rule of law, first, in the Preamble, and second, in article 3 with the requirement that 'every Member of the Council of Europe must accept the principle of the rule of law . . .'⁹⁷ It is described as being one of the three pillars of the Council of Europe.⁹⁸

In the French versions of both the Statute of the Council of Europe and the European Convention on Human Rights, 'rule of law' is translated as prééminence du droit and not as état de droit. Nevertheless, the term état de droit is occasionally used in French versions of judgments of the Court as the equivalent of 'rule of law'.⁹⁹

The rule of law has been described as 'one of the fundamental principles of a democratic society'. Mentioned by name only in the Preamble, it is described as being 'inherent in all the Articles of the Convention',¹⁰⁰ one of the 'cornerstones of the Convention',¹⁰¹ an 'essential protection of the individual',¹⁰² and a concept from which the entire Convention draws its inspiration.¹⁰³ As it was understood at the time the Convention was drafted, and probably until the 1990s, the concept of rule of law meant that the government was accountable to the courts. As one judgment put it, 'an interference by the executive authorities with an individual's rights should be subject to an effective control which should normally be assured by the judiciary, at least in the last resort, judicial control offering the best guarantees of independence, impartiality and a proper procedure'.¹⁰⁴ It entails a duty on the part of the State or other public authority to comply with judicial orders or decisions against it.¹⁰⁵

In Golder, the United Kingdom argued that the drafters engaged in a 'selective process', choosing to adopt only 'certain of the Rights stated in the Universal Declaration'.¹⁰⁶ The Court concluded:

The 'selective' nature of the Convention cannot be put in question. It may also be accepted, as the Government have submitted, that the Preamble does not include the rule of law in the object and purpose of the Convention, but points to it as being one of the features of the common spiritual heritage of the member States of the Council of Europe. The Court however considers, like the Commission, that it would be a mistake to see in this reference a merely 'more or less rhetorical reference', devoid of relevance for those interpreting the Convention. One reason why the signatory Governments decided to 'take the first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the Rights stated in the Universal Declaration' was their profound belief in the rule of law.¹⁰⁷

A central aspect of the rule of law is the right to a fair hearing before a tribunal, guaranteed by article 6(1) of the Convention and a principle to be interpreted in the light of the Preamble. According to the Court, '[o]ne of the fundamental aspects of the rule of law is the principle of legal certainty, which requires, inter alia, that where the courts have finally determined an issue, their ruling should not be called into question'.¹⁰⁸

A report of the Venice Commission of the Council of Europe has endorsed a succinct statement of the rule of law by British judge Tom Bingham: '[A]ll persons and authorities within the state, whether public or private, should be bound by and entitled to the benefit of laws publicly made, taking effect (generally) in the future and publicly administered in the courts.'¹⁰⁹ The Commission has said it should be expanded with the following eight 'ingredients': accessibility of the law (that it be intelligible, clear, and predictable); questions of legal right should be normally decided by law and not discretion; there should be equality before the law; power must be exercised lawfully, fairly, and reasonably; human rights must be protected; means must be provided to resolve disputes without undue cost or delay; trials must be fair; the State must comply with its obligations in international law as well as in national law.¹¹⁰ Judgments of the Court have said that 'the role played by limitation periods is of major importance when interpreted in the light of the Preamble to the Convention, which, in its relevant part, declares the rule of law to be part of the common heritage of the Contracting States'.¹¹¹

Recently the notion of 'rule of law' has come to be associated with a much broader notion of assistance in the development of functioning justice systems. According to the United Nations Secretary General, the concept 'refers to a principle of governance in which all persons, institutions and entities, public and private, including the State itself, are accountable to laws that are publicly promulgated, equally enforced and independently adjudicated, and which are consistent with international human rights norms and standards. It requires, as well, measures to ensure adherence to the principles of supremacy of law, equality before the law, accountability to the law, fairness in the application of the law, separation of powers, participation in decision-making, legal certainty, avoidance of arbitrariness and procedural and legal transparency.'¹¹²

Collective enforcement (recital 5)

The Convention system considers that the rights and freedoms it protects are subject to 'collective enforcement', as stated in recital 5 of the Preamble: '... to take the first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration...' This is the only reference in the Preamble to the Convention as a system of enforcement of human rights rather than merely as a standard-setting instrument. Its importance is underscored by the reprisal of these words in the much more succinct preambles to Protocol Nos 1, 4, and 7 of the Convention. Referring to recital 5 and the reference to 'collective enforcement', the European Commission of Human Rights observed 'that the purpose of the High Contracting parties in concluding the Convention was not to concede to each other reciprocal rights and obligations in pursuance of their individual national interests but to realise the aims and ideals of the Council of Europe, as expressed in its Statute, and to establish a common public order of the free democracies of Europe with the object of safeguarding their common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law'.¹¹³ The Commission went on to refer to the 'objective character' of the obligations imposed by the Convention, noting that this appeared in the machinery provided for the observance of such obligations 'founded upon the concept of a collective guarantee by the High Contracting Parties of the rights and freedoms set forth in the Convention'.¹¹⁴

The Court has spoken of 'the Convention's special character as a treaty for the collective enforcement of human rights and fundamental freedoms'.¹¹⁵ Thus, it is said that '[u]nlike international treaties of the classic kind, the Convention comprises more than mere reciprocal engagements between Contracting States. It creates, over and above a network of mutual, bilateral undertakings, objective obligations which, in the words of the Preamble benefit from a "collective enforcement"'.¹¹⁶ The reference to collective enforcement in the Preamble has also been linked to the requirement that the Convention 'be interpreted and applied so as to make its safeguards practical and effective'.¹¹⁷ The mechanisms for collective enforcement 'serve the public order of Europe'.¹¹⁸

The insistence on collective enforcement must be considered alongside the principle of subsidiarity, explicitly mentioned in recital 6 of the Preamble, whereby the primary responsibility for the enforcement of human rights lies with the individual States Parties themselves.¹¹⁹ The issue was highlighted in one of the early decisions of the Court, where reference was made to the 'subsidiary nature of the international machinery of collective enforcement established by the Convention'.¹²⁰ Even earlier, the Commission had addressed the tension between the collective enforcement and subsidiarity in the context of the rule on exhaustion of domestic remedies: the mere fact that the system of international protection in the Convention is founded upon the concept of a collective guarantee of the rights and freedoms contained in the Convention does not in any way weaken the force of the principle on which the domestic remedies rule is founded or the considerations which led to its introduction'.¹²¹ Occasionally, the case law has attempted to address the relationship. For example, one Chamber has noted that '[t]hrough its system of collective enforcement of the rights it establishes, the Convention reinforces, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, the protection afforded at national level'.¹²² Another has insisted that 'the international machinery of collective enforcement established by the Convention is subsidiary to the national systems safeguarding human rights'.¹²³

The reference to 'collective enforcement' in recital 5 of the Preamble has been used by the Grand Chamber to support the position that article 6 of the Convention does not apply to measures of expulsion.¹²⁴

Principle of subsidiarity (recital 6)

According to the principle of subsidiarity, the primary responsibility for the enforcement of the European Convention lies with States. Only when they fail to do so does the machinery of the Convention, in particular the Court, intervene in the process.¹²⁵ It also contains within it a notion of deference to national justice systems with respect to their determinations of both fact and law. Subsidiary has been described as 'the very basis of the Convention', its basis within the texts being a combined reading of articles 1 and 19.¹²⁶ According to the Explanatory Report on Protocol No. 14,

Under Article 1 of the Convention, it is with the High Contracting Parties that the obligation lies 'to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms' guaranteed by the Convention, whereas the role of the Court, under Article 19, is 'to ensure the observance of the engagements undertaken by the High Contracting Parties in the Convention'. In other words, securing rights and freedoms is primarily the responsibility of the Parties; the Court's role is subsidiary.¹²⁷

Subsidiarity is also manifested in article 13, the provision ensuring availability at the national level of a remedy to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they may happen to be secured in the domestic legal order.¹²⁸ For decades, the principle of subsidiarity has been acknowledged in decisions of the Court.¹²⁹ It was formally recognized by a recital in the Preamble, added as part of the amendments resulting from Protocol No. 15. The Explanatory Report states that the intention was 'to enhance the transparency and accessibility' of this characteristic of the Convention system.¹³⁰ The preambular reference was a compromise with the more extreme suggestion, advanced by the United Kingdom, to incorporate the concept within an operative provision of the Convention.¹³¹ In an opinion on the text issued at the request of the Committee of Ministers, the Court welcomed the insertion of the reference to subsidiarity in the Preamble. 'The wording used in this respect, and in the explanatory report, reflects the Court's pronouncements on the principle', it said.¹³² The Parliamentary Assembly also presented an opinion on the amendment. The Rapporteur of the Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights said the addition 'can only be welcomed'. He continued:

The States Parties to the Convention are obliged to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in the Convention, and to provide an effective remedy before a national authority for everyone whose rights and freedoms are violated. The Court authoritatively interprets the Convention. It also acts as a safeguard for individuals whose rights and freedoms are not secured at the national level. The Convention places primary responsibility on States Parties to secure fundamental rights and freedoms to everyone within their jurisdiction (Article 1) and to provide effective remedies for allegations of violations (Article 13), and the Court should be seized only 'after all domestic remedies are exhausted' (Article 35, paragraph 1). Subsidiarity and, to a certain extent, the related doctrine of a 'margin of appreciation', as developed by the Court, require that the Strasbourg Court plays a complementary role to domestic court decisions and legislation: States have the duty to integrate Convention standards, as interpreted by the Court, within their own legal systems. In other words, the principle of subsidiarity has two aspects: one procedural, requiring individuals to go through all the relevant procedures at national level before seizing the Court, and the other substantive, based on the assumption that States are, in principle, better placed to assess the necessity and proportionality of specific measures that may interfere with certain rights. That said, a State can and often does guarantee a higher level of protection, and the Court obviously accords certain latitude to the domestic authorities to strike their own balance regarding Convention rights, guided by the relevant European case-law. But the Court has the final say on the interpretation of the Convention in all cases brought before it.¹³³

¹³³ Draft Protocol No. 15 amending the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Report, Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, Doc. 13154, para. 8 (internal references omitted).

The principle of subsidiarity applies in at least three different contexts. First, it defines the relationship between the law of the Convention and internal law, in the sense that it is primarily the duty of internal law to ensure that rights are respected.¹³⁴ Of course, in many countries the Convention will be incorporated directly into internal law.¹³⁵ But this is not a requirement of the Convention. Where there is no direct incorporation, the burden falls first upon the internal legal order to protect fundamental rights. According to the Court, the Convention reinforces, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, the protection afforded at national level, but never limits it.¹³⁶

Secondly, the principle of subsidiarity defines the relationship between the system of enforcement established by the Convention, and in particular the European Court of Human Rights, and the mechanisms of internal law. As early as the Belgian Linguistic case, the Court indicated that it should not 'assume the role of the competent national authorities, for it would thereby lose sight of the subsidiary nature of the international machinery of collective enforcement established by the Convention'.¹³⁷ The Court has declared that '[i]t is fundamental to the machinery of protection established by the Convention that the national systems themselves provide redress for breaches of its provisions, with the Court exercising a supervisory role subject to the principle of subsidiarity'.¹³⁸

In terms of the enforcement machinery, the principle is reflected above all in article 35 (1) of the Convention in the requirement that domestic remedies be exhausted before recourse may be had to the European Court. The rationale for exhaustion of domestic remedies is 'the subsidiary nature of the Convention instruments, that is to say, the principle that the national authorities must be first given the opportunity to remedy the violation complained of'.¹³⁹ Given that the rule of exhaustion is limited by the availability of adequate or effective remedies within the national system, 'the principle of subsidiarity [is] not absolute'.¹⁴⁰

According to the principle of subsidiarity, in immigration cases the 'sole concern' of the Court is 'to examine the effectiveness of the domestic procedures and ensure that they respect human rights'.¹⁴¹ In cases involving asylum seekers, the Court has said that its task is not to examine how States honour their obligations under the Refugee Convention, but rather to determine that effective guarantees exist against arbitrary refoulement.¹⁴²

Under the principle of subsidiarity, a State is free to choose the means by which it implements a decision of the Court, subject to monitoring by the Committee of Ministers.¹⁴³ Effective implementation of judgments, pursuant to article 46 of the Convention, helps to alleviate a burden upon the Court that may result from an avalanche of similar cases if a State does not properly comply with a judgment.¹⁴⁴ The pilot judgment procedure, by which emblematic cases provide States with guidelines facilitating remediation of structural problems, has been described as the implementation of the principle of subsidiarity.¹⁴⁵

It may seem a paradox, but just as the European Convention exists to ensure that the national legal order respects human rights, at the same time the European Court manifests considerable deference towards domestic courts and their determinations. This is particularly true when constitutional courts are involved, given that they apply principles similar, if not identical in nature, to those enshrined in the Convention, and often rely upon the case law of the European Court itself.¹⁴⁶ As one judge explained, the Court does not have, 'with the usual paraphernalia of constitutional law, an interest in meddling in what national legislation should or should not do. Subsidiarity is a healthy collateral effect of the simple fact that an international judicial body does not know how to, and thus does not want to, enter into the details of national legislative happenings.'¹⁴⁷ More generally, 'the principle of subsidiarity dictates that the Court will not overrule interpretations of the domestic law given by the domestic courts, except in specific circumstances... The Court retains only residual control in this sphere.'¹⁴⁸ This approach applies even when the national courts rule against the government, for example in deciding that legislation is not sheltered by derogation pursuant to article 15. Where the highest courts concluded that derogation by the United Kingdom was inconsistent with article 15 because the measures taken to deal with a public emergency were not strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, the European Court of Human Rights said 'it would be justified in reaching a contrary conclusion only if satisfied that the national court had misinterpreted or misapplied Article 15 or the Court's jurisprudence under that Article or reached a conclusion which was manifestly unreasonable'.¹⁴⁹

It is often said that the Court does not operate as a fourth-instance court, reviewing matters concerning sentences imposed and damages awarded, in the absence of evidence that there is arbitrariness.¹⁵⁰ Nor is it a first-instance court, assessing issues of fact, whose investigation and assessment is 'to be resolved in so far as possible at the domestic level'.¹⁵¹ Although 'the Court is not bound by the findings of domestic courts and remains free to make its own appreciation in the light of all the material before it, in normal circumstances it requires cogent elements to lead it to depart from the findings of fact reached by the domestic courts'.¹⁵² For example, '[w]here the circumstances of a particular case so require, especially where the death of a victim is arguably attributable to the use of lethal force by State agents, the Court may entertain a fresh assessment of evidence'.¹⁵³

Thirdly, the principle of subsidiarity governs not only the relationship between the national legal order and the Convention system but also the application of law within a given State. It has been said by some judges that '[t]he notion of a democratic society encompasses the idea of subsidiarity'. Accordingly, 'a democratic society may flourish only in a State that respects the principle of subsidiarity and allows the different social actors to self-regulate their activities'.¹⁵⁴ Along the same lines, a judge has insisted that the 'democratic ideal' requires that 'the principle of State subsidiarity should not be overlooked'.¹⁵⁵ In another context, some judges have invoked the notion of subsidiarity with respect to criminal law, arguing that 'use of the weapon of punishment is acceptable only if there are no other means of protecting the values or interests at stake'.¹⁵⁶

Margin of appreciation (recital 6)

Like the principle of subsidiarity, with which it is closely related,¹⁵⁷ the 'margin of appreciation' is a concept that is well entrenched in the case law of the Court. Pursuant to Protocol No. 15, an explicit recognition of the doctrine is now contained in recital 6 of the Preamble. According to the Explanatory Report on Protocol No. 15,

The jurisprudence of the Court makes clear that the States Parties enjoy a margin of appreciation in how they apply and implement the Convention, depending on the circumstances of the case and the rights and freedoms engaged. This reflects that the Convention system is subsidiary to the safeguarding of human rights at national level and that national authorities are in principle better placed than an international court to evaluate local needs and conditions. The margin of appreciation goes hand in hand with supervision under the Convention system. In this respect, the role of the Court is to review whether decisions taken by national authorities are compatible with the Convention, having due regard to the State's margin of appreciation.¹⁵⁸

The Court was not entirely content with the formulation of the margin of appreciation in the draft text. In light of the Court's opinion, the Steering Committee on Human Rights took its views into account and decided to 'clarify' in the Explanatory Report that its intention was 'to be consistent with the doctrine of the margin of appreciation as developed by the Court in its case-law'. However, it also chose not to amend the text as drafted.¹⁵⁹ The Court responded, in an opinion on the draft issued at the request of the Committee of Ministers, that '[t]he intended meaning can therefore be said to be in line with the relevant terms of the Brighton Declaration'.¹⁶⁰ It referred to paragraph 12b of the Brighton Declaration calling for the addition to the Preamble, 'for reasons of transparency and accessibility [of] a reference to the principle of subsidiarity and the doctrine of the margin of appreciation as developed in the Court's case law'. The Court affirmed that 'there clearly was no common intention of the High Contracting Parties to alter either the substance of the Convention or its system of international, collective enforcement'. The Court said it would have preferred 'a more developed text', but it acknowledged that the result represented a compromise among States. 'In any event, both the explanation given and the context in which the text was drafted are themselves legally significant, as illustrated by the Court's references to the Explanatory Report to Protocol No. 14 and to the Interlaken Action Plan in Korolev v. Russia (dec.), no. 25551/05, ECHR 2010', the Court said. 'Moreover, the report of the relevant meeting of the CDDH—an extract of which the Committee of Ministers appended to its request for the present opinion—forms part of the travaux préparatoires of the Protocol and thus is relevant to its interpretation.'¹⁶¹

Speaking of the addition of a reference to the margin of appreciation, the Rapporteur of the Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights of the Parliamentary Assembly said that '[n]eedless to add, no "margin of appreciation" exists with respect to the Convention's non-derogable rights in matters of life and death, torture or slavery'. Consequently, he wrote, it is important to bear in mind, as indicated in both the Explanatory Report and the opinion of the Court, 'the clear intention of the drafters of the text to make express reference to "the doctrine of the margin of appreciation as developed by the Court in its case-law"'.¹⁶²

Much attention has been accorded to the margin of appreciation doctrine in the academic literature.¹⁶³ The European Commission of Human Rights developed the doctrine of margin of appreciation in its very early case law, essentially with regard to the determination of states of emergency,¹⁶⁴ and the application of articles 8 and 10.¹⁶⁵ It also employed the term 'margin of discretion', seemingly as a synonym for margin of appreciation.¹⁶⁶ The Court took note of the Commission's doctrine of the margin of appreciation¹⁶⁷ but did not endorse or adopt it immediately. The 'margin' of appreciation varies considerably, depending upon the nature of the right in question and the context in which it is being invoked. In determining the margin of appreciation, the Court normally distinguishes between infringements that are attributable to the State and those resulting from the acts of other individuals, whose rights must also be considering in striking the right balance.¹⁷⁰

Generally, a wide margin of appreciation is attributed with respect to general measures of economic or social strategy.¹⁷¹ States are considered to be better placed than international judges to assess the best interests of the public with respect to economic and social issues. Consequently, the Court will generally respect the legislative policy choices unless they are 'manifestly without reasonable foundation'.¹⁷² When housing issues relate to social policy, especially in an urban or rural planning context, '[i]n so far as the exercise of discretion involving a multitude of local factors is inherent in the choice and implementation of planning policies, the national authorities in principle enjoy a wide margin of appreciation'.¹⁷³ But 'where the right at stake is crucial to the individual's effective enjoyment of intimate or key rights', the margin of appreciation is not as broad.¹⁷⁴ In a case dealing with pension schemes, the Court said that 'the precise timing and means of putting right the inequality were not so manifestly unreasonable as to exceed the wide margin of appreciation allowed it in such a field'.¹⁷⁵

Similarly, the European Court acknowledges that 'issues relating to just and proportionate punishment are the subject of rational debate and civilised disagreement',¹⁷⁶ granting States a margin of appreciation in setting the appropriate length of sentence. The margin of appreciation has been invoked to justify considerable latitude with respect to parliamentary immunities¹⁷⁷ and rules of criminal justice concerning presence of the accused at trial.¹⁷⁸

When very sensitive political, moral, and ethical issues are involved, and on which there is nothing resembling a degree of European consensus, such as when the right to life begins, the Court will relegate the matter to the margin of appreciation.¹⁷⁹ In A, B and C, the Grand Chamber held that there was 'a consensus amongst a substantial majority of the Contracting States of the Council of Europe towards allowing abortion on broader grounds than accorded under Irish law', but said this could not displace Ireland's margin of appreciation on the subject.¹⁸⁰ But in a Polish case, the Court said 'the fact that the issue of the availability of legal abortion in Poland is a subject of heated debate does not confer on the State a margin of appreciation so wide as to absolve the medical staff from their uncontested professional obligations regarding medical secrecy'.¹⁸¹

The State's margin of appreciation is more restrained when 'a particularly important facet of an individual's existence or identity is at stake'. This is also the case when intimate aspects of private life are involved.¹⁸² Nevertheless, 'domestic authorities enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in determining how to confront incestuous relationships between consenting adults, notwithstanding the fact that this decision concerns an intimate aspect of an individual's private life'.¹⁸³ According to the Court, 'a broad consensus transpires that sexual relationships between siblings are neither accepted by the legal order nor by society as a whole'.¹⁸⁴ In a case concerning refusal by a local registry official to validate same-sex civil partnerships, the Court said that it 'generally allows the national authorities a wide margin of appreciation when it comes to striking a balance between competing Convention rights', particularly when the policy at issue was 'aimed to secure the rights of others which are also protected under the Convention'.¹⁸⁵ On the other hand, 'given the sensitive moral choices concerned and the importance to be attached to the protection of children and the fostering of secure family environments, this Court must not rush to substitute its own judgment in place of the authorities who are best placed to assess and respond to the needs of society'.¹⁸⁶

The margin of appreciation is almost invariably considered when the Court is considering restrictions on rights, notably in light of paragraph 2 of articles 8, 9, 10, and 11 of the Convention. The adjective 'necessary' is often taken to imply a 'pressing social need'. According to the Court, '[b]ecause of their direct, continuous contact with the realities of the country, a State's courts are in a better position than an international court to determine how, at a given time, the right balance can be struck' in evaluating such pressing social needs.¹⁸⁷ But the margin of appreciation 'goes hand in hand with European supervision'.¹⁸⁸ Although the national authorities make the initial assessment of necessity, 'the final evaluation as to whether the reasons cited for the interference are relevant and sufficient remains subject to review by the Court for conformity with the requirements of the Convention'.¹⁸⁹

The margin of appreciation is also important when rights are restricted or in the case of derogation, in accordance with article 15 of the Convention. The Court may be quite deferential towards assessments by a government as to what constitutes a threat to 'the life of [its] nation', granting States a wide margin.¹⁹⁰ The Court's role is to determine whether States have gone beyond the 'extent strictly required by the exigencies' of the crisis. In supervising such measures, 'the Court must give appropriate weight to such relevant factors as the nature of the rights affected by the derogation and the circumstances leading to, and the duration of, the emergency situation'.¹⁹¹

An indication of the controversial nature of the margin of appreciation doctrine can be seen in the refusal of any endorsement by the United Nations Human Rights Committee in its interpretation of essentially similar provisions in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. When Finland referred to the margin of appreciation noting its adoption by the European Court of Human Rights in many cases,¹⁹² the argument was dismissed,¹⁹³ a position confirmed subsequently in a General Comment of the Committee.¹⁹⁴

Article 1. Obligation to respect human rights/Obligation de respecter les droits de l'homme

The High Contracting Parties shall secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in Section I of this Convention.

Les Hautes Parties contractantes reconnaissent à toute personne relevant de leur juridiction les droits et libertés définis au titre I de la présente Convention.

Introductory comments

Article 1 'demarcates the scope of the Convention ratione personae, materiae and loci'.¹ Comparable, although slightly different, clauses can be found in other international human rights treaties. For example, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights specifies that a State Party 'undertakes to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognised in the present Covenant, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status'.²

Drafting of the provision

The initial draft European Convention on Human Rights was prepared by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement, chaired by Pierre-Henri Teitgen, with David Maxwell Fyfe and Fernand Dehousse as rapporteurs. Both Maxwell Fyfe and Dehousse had been involved in the drafting of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights the previous year. The text began: 'Art. 1. Every State a party to this Convention shall guarantee to all persons within its territory the following rights: ...'³ The European Movement text formed the basis of the discussions that took place in the Consultative Assembly, initially in its Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions. The Committee adopted the following text: 'In this Convention, the Member States shall undertake to ensure to all persons residing within their territories ...'⁴ It had considered but rejected using the term 'domiciled' rather than 'residing', and agreed not to limit the word 'territories' with 'metropolitan'.⁵ Its report noted that with respect to extension of the rights 'not only to all persons residing within its metropolitan territory, but also to all persons residing within its overseas territories or in its colonial possessions, the majority of the Committee replied in the affirmative'. It noted that 'reservations were made on this point by some members of the Committee, who were not able to appreciate exactly the difficulties which this solution might raise'.⁶ The plenary Consultative Assembly endorsed the proposed text and adopted it without amendment.⁷

Weeks earlier, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights had agreed upon a similar provision as part of the draft International Covenant on Human Rights: 'Each State party hereto hereby undertakes to ensure to all individuals within its jurisdiction the rights defined in this Covenant. Where not already provided by legislative or other measures, each State undertakes, in accordance with its constitutional processes and in accordance with the provisions of this Covenant, to adopt within a reasonable time such legislative or other measures to give effect to the rights defined in this Covenant.'⁸ Commenting on the differences between the United Nations draft Covenant and the Consultative Assembly draft Convention, the Secretariat of the Council of Europe noted that the former guaranteed rights to 'persons within the State's jurisdiction' whereas the latter referred to 'all persons residing within their territories'.⁹

In the Committee of Experts, meeting in February 1950, the United Kingdom tabled the following amendment: 'Each State party hereto undertakes to ensure to all individuals within its jurisdiction the rights defined in this Convention. Every deposit of an instrument of accession shall be accompanied by a solemn declaration made by the Government of the State concerned with full and complete effect as given by the law of that State of the provisions of the Convention.'¹⁰ The Italian expert proposed replacing the words 'residing within' in the draft of the Consultative Assembly with the words 'living in'.¹¹ Considering the proposed amendments, a Sub-Committee of the Committee of Experts noted that 'the aim of this amendment is to widen as far as possible the categories of persons who are to benefit by the guarantee contained in the Convention'. It suggested, then, that the wording adopted by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights would be preferable. The Sub-commission acknowledged that some rights 'cannot be guaranteed to aliens without any restrictions'.¹²

The Committee of Experts adopted the following provision: 'The High Contracting Parties undertake to accord to any person within their jurisdiction the rights set out in Article 2 of this Convention, subject to the conditions given below.'¹³ In its report to the Committee of Ministers, the Committee noted 'the ambiguity which might arise by the word "guarantee," since the aim of the Convention was not to set up an international guarantee to be undertaken by the signature States themselves', adding that the Committee had decided the word should be replaced with 'accord'.¹⁴ It noted that the term 'all persons residing within the territories of the signatory States' in the Constituent Assembly draft 'might be considered too restrictive'. The Committee 'felt that there were good grounds for extending the benefits of the Convention to all persons in the territories of the signatory States, even those who could not be considered as residing there in the legal sense of the word. This word, moreover, has not the same meaning in all national laws.' The Committee therefore adopted the words 'within their jurisdiction', just as the United Nations Commission on Human Rights had done.¹⁵

The Committee of Experts met again in March, adopting two alternative models of the Convention, the first (Alternatives A and A/2) based on simple enumeration and the second (Alternatives B and B/2) upon precise definition of fundamental rights. Although there was no reason for the general clause on the obligation of States parties to differ in the two versions, there were separate proposals:

Alternatives A and A/2.

Art. 1. The High Contracting Parties undertake to accord to every person within their jurisdiction the rights set out in Art. 2 of this Convention, subject to the conditions given below.¹⁶

Alternatives B and B/2.

Art. 1(1). The High Contracting Parties undertake to accord to all individuals within their jurisdiction the rights defined in Section I of this Convention.¹⁷

The accompanying Explanatory Report said that article 1 of Alternatives A and A/2 replaced article 1 of the Consultative Assembly proposal 'which, in reality, was not part of the Convention but expressed the tenor of the Recommendation which the Assembly submitted to the Committee of Ministers'. The report noted the 'ambiguity' that might arise from the use of the word 'guarantee', noting that the aim of the Convention was not to set up an international guarantee to be undertaken by States but rather the safeguarding of rights by the establishment of European bodies. For this reason, the term 'accord' was preferred. The Committee of Experts explained that it had decided not to employ the word 'residing' because '[i]t was felt that there were good grounds for extending the benefits of the Convention to all persons in the territories of the signatory States, even those who could not be considered as residing there in the legal sense'.¹⁸

Although the approaches in the two alternatives were quite different, the two texts of article 1 were not, and they do not appear to have attracted any attention during the general debate in the Conference of Senior Officials that took place in June 1950.¹⁹ The Conference decided unanimously that the Convention should not include a solemn declaration to the effect that domestic legislation gave full effect to the provisions of the Convention.²⁰ Its report added that 'in the absence of any provision to the contrary, every signatory State is presumed to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention from the moment the State has given its adherence'.²¹ The Conference settled on a formulation that blended the two alternative texts: 'The High Contracting Parties undertake to secure to all individuals within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in Section 1 of this Convention.'²² The words 'and freedoms' had been added after 'rights'.

In a letter to the Committee of Ministers, the chairman of the Constituent Assembly's Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions made the following observation:

[I]n order to avoid any misunderstanding as to the legal scope of the Convention, it would be desirable the words 'undertake to secure' be replaced by the words 'hereby secure' in respect of the attitude of the High Contracting Parties towards the rights and freedoms enumerated in Section II of the Convention; for the former phrasing appears to imply for each of them a separate action apart from the simple acceptance of the Convention.²³

The Sub-Committee on Human Rights of the Committee of Ministers met in August 1950. It replaced the words 'undertake to secure' with 'shall secure',²⁴ on a proposal from the United Kingdom.²⁵ There was no further discussion of article 1, aside from a decision of the Committee of Ministers in November 1950 to change the words 'all persons' to 'everyone' for reasons of consistency with other provisions in the Convention.²⁶

The Grand Chamber considered the travaux préparatoires of article 1 in Banković.²⁷ It said that they 'constitute a clear indication of the intended meaning of Article 1 of the Convention which cannot be ignored' and 'clear confirmatory evidence of the ordinary meaning of Article 1'.²⁸

The heading 'Obligation to respect human rights' was added according to the provisions of Protocol No. 11.²⁹

Analysis and interpretation

Article 1 is 'one of the many Articles that attest the binding character of the Convention'.³⁰ Nevertheless, it is a 'framework provision that cannot be breached on its own'.³¹ It is drafted 'by reference to the provisions contained in Section I and thus comes into operation only when taken in conjunction with them; a violation of Article 1 (art. 1) follows automatically from, but adds nothing to, a breach of those provisions'.³² In Soering v. The United Kingdom, the Plenary Court explained the significance of article 1:

Article 1... sets a limit, notably territorial, on the reach of the Convention. In particular, the engagement undertaken by a Contracting State is confined to 'securing' ('reconnaître' in the French text) the listed rights and freedoms to persons within its own 'jurisdiction'. Further, the Convention does not govern the actions of States not Parties to it, nor does it purport to be a means of requiring the Contracting States to impose Convention standards on other States.³³

Article 1 applies to Section I of the Convention. One of three Sections in the Convention, Section I consists of articles 2 to 18. It contains the substantive rights, set out in articles 2 to 14, but also the special provisions dealing with derogation, political activity of aliens, abuse of rights, and limitations on use of restrictions contained in articles 15 to 18. Each of the Protocols contains an article entitled 'Relationship to the Convention', where it is stated that the substantive provisions 'shall be regarded as additional Articles to the Convention and all the provisions of the Convention shall apply accordingly'. As a result, there is no doubt about the application of article 1 to the Protocols.

In the Belgian Linguistic case, the respondent State submitted that there was an inherent limitation on the scope of the Convention imposed by the 'reserved domain'. It created 'an inherent limit to the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction, this limit being so evident that it depends neither on an explicit clause of the Convention nor on a reservation'.³⁴ Relying upon article 1, the Plenary Court said that although the Convention relates to matters normally falling within the domestic legal order of the Contracting States, it is an international instrument whose main purpose is to lay down certain international standards to be observed by the Contracting States in their relations with persons under their jurisdiction.³⁵

'The High Contracting Parties ...'

The European Convention uses the term 'High Contracting Parties' to refer to the States that have ratified or acceded to it. Today, this is somewhat archaic usage. Modern treaties tend to refer to 'States Parties' or 'Parties'.³⁶ These terms are sometimes employed in place of 'High Contracting Parties' in the judgments and individual opinions of the European Court of Human Rights.³⁷ Article 2 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties indicates a distinction: 'Contracting Party' designates 'a State which has consented to be bound by the treaty, whether or not the treaty has entered into force', whereas 'State Party' refers to 'a State which has consented to be bound by the treaty and for which the treaty is in force'. According to an isolated pronouncement of the European Commission of Human Rights, 'il découle d'autre part de l'article [59] de la Convention que seuls les pays membres du Conseil de l'Europe ayant dûment signé et ratifié la Convention possèdent la qualité de Parties Contractantes'.³⁸

In a traditional treaty-law context, each of the 'High Contracting Parties' assumes obligations with respect to the other States that are party to the Convention. The States Parties are subject to the principle pacta sunt servanda: 'Every treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith.'³⁹ General rules governing the responsibility of States are set out in the Draft articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, adopted by the United Nations International Law Commission in 2001.⁴⁰ They are applicable to the European Convention,⁴¹ bearing in mind the restriction on alternate means of dispute resolution provided in article 55 of the Convention.

The contractual arrangements between the States that are party to the Convention are not really reciprocal in the sense that they are concerned with a bilateral relationship. Rather, States Parties have stipulated obligations or duties with respect to 'everyone within their jurisdiction'. As the European Commission of Human Rights stated in one of its earliest decisions, in an inter-State application,

... the obligations undertaken by the High Contracting Parties in the European Convention are essentially of an objective character being designed rather to protect the fundamental rights of individual human beings from infringements by any of the High Contracting Parties than to create subjective and reciprocal rights for the High Contracting Parties themselves.⁴²

The Convention creates 'special obligations' that are owed by a State 'towards persons within its jurisdiction, not to other High Contracting Parties'.⁴³

The responsibility of the State applies to all of its organs, 'whether they belong to the legislature, the executive or the judiciary'.⁴⁴ It is required to ensure that its legislation is consistent with the Convention. Even the constitution must be compatible with the Convention.⁴⁵ The State is also responsible for the conduct of its administrative authorities, as well as various bodies associated with the State including, in some cases, State-owned companies⁴⁶ and decentralized authorities that exercise public functions, regardless of their degree of autonomy.⁴⁷ Such bodies include various municipal and territorial institutions,⁴⁸ as well as professional corporations that exercise 'des fonctions officielles... attribuées par la Constitution et par la loi'⁴⁹ and national railway companies under state control in a monopolistic situation.⁵⁰ The State may also be responsible for acts of private individuals that violate Convention rights where there is evidence that the authorities connived or acquiesced.⁵¹

The obligation also extends beyond conduct of the State itself and its organs to the extent that there is also a duty to ensure that third parties do not infringe the rights of individuals. This is one aspect of the positive obligation associated with the duties of the State party.

'... shall secure...', negative and positive obligations

Referring to the travaux préparatoires, the Plenary Court noted that '[b]y substituting the words "shall secure" for the words "undertake to secure" in the text of Article 1, the drafters of the Convention also intended to make it clear that the rights and freedoms set out in Section I would be directly secured to anyone within the jurisdiction of the Contracting States'.⁵² Nevertheless, article 1 does not require States to incorporate the Convention directly into national law and thereby make it directly applicable before domestic courts. In some 'dualist' countries, international law does not have such a direct effect. There, States Parties are required to ensure that Convention rights are enforceable, although they need not do this by incorporating the text into the domestic legal system. The Court has confirmed that the Convention does not prescribe 'any given manner for ensuring within their internal law the effective implementation of any of the provisions of the Convention'.⁵³

The obligation to respect human rights has both negative and positive dimensions. In a negative sense, States are under an obligation not to violate articles 2 to 14, as well as the substantive provisions of the Protocols to the extent these have been ratified. But they must also ensure respect for the Convention and the Protocols through, for example, establishing a legal framework for the protection of these rights and enforcing measures to ensure its observance. This is what is meant by the positive dimension. With respect to the right to life defined in article 2, States are under a duty not only to refrain from taking the lives of those subject to their jurisdiction but also to ensure that lives are protected, through the enforcement of criminal justice, punishment of murder and attempted murder, appropriate measures of inquiry and investigation when there is loss of life under questionable circumstances, and minimum standards of medical care. Similarly, article 1 applies in cases of ill-treatment falling under article 3 to the extent that 'States must take measures designed to ensure that individuals within their jurisdiction are not subjected to ill-treatment administered not only by State agents but also by private individuals.'⁵⁴

According to the Court, 'by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention, each Contracting Party "shall secure to everyone within [its] jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in... [the] Convention". The discharge of this general duty may entail positive obligations inherent in ensuring the effective exercise of the rights guaranteed by the Convention.'⁵⁵ In the context of freedom of religion, the Court has invoked 'the States' positive obligation under Article 1 of the Convention to secure to everyone within its jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined therein' in holding that '[i]n democratic societies, in which several religions and beliefs coexist within one and the same population, it may be necessary to place restrictions on the freedom to manifest one's religion or belief in order to reconcile the interests of the various groups and to ensure that everyone's beliefs are respected'.⁵⁶

Although the distinction between positive and negative obligations is often quite clear, sometimes the Court refuses to determine the nature of the duty.⁵⁷ It notes that whether the basis of its analysis is a positive duty to take measures to secure the rights of the individual or a negative duty upon a public authority not to interfere, 'the applicable principles are broadly similar. In both contexts regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole.'⁵⁸ However, in some cases, there is considerable debate about whether or not to characterize the alleged infringement as being related to a negative or a positive obligation.⁵⁹ If the obligation is positive rather than negative, the margin of appreciation granted to the State may be larger.⁶⁰

'... to everyone ...'

The rights enshrined in the Convention must be secured to 'everyone'. In a concurring opinion, Judge Bonello highlighted the importance of rights being secured to 'everyone', noting that the universality it establishes was 'the cornerstone of the Convention'.⁶¹ The word 'everyone' also appears in articles 2, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, and 11 of the Convention, and in a few provisions of the Protocols.⁶² Sometimes the Convention formulates a right in a negative sense: 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.' The word 'everyone' in article 1 should be read in conjunction with article 34, where a right of petition to the Court is recognized to 'any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals'. It applies to corporate bodies or moral persons, which are viewed as non-governmental organizations for the purposes of article 34.⁶³ For some rights, however, the context makes it clear that only physical persons are contemplated. Article 34 concerns admissibility criteria. However, it would make no sense that article 34 could have a broader scope than article 1.

No decision of the Court has clarified whether the unborn child is subsumed within the term 'everyone'. The issue is particularly sensitive given variation in practice within European States on the issue of abortion. The current position is that 'the issue of when the right to life begins comes within the margin of appreciation which the Court generally considers that States should enjoy in this sphere'.⁶⁴ According to the Grand Chamber, Europe lacks a 'consensus on the scientific and legal definition of the beginning of life'.⁶⁵ The Court has spoken of 'the impossibility of finding a uniform European conception of morals including on the question of when life begins'.⁶⁶

'... within their jurisdiction ...'

The obligation imposed by article 1 upon States is to secure rights 'within their jurisdiction'. The term 'jurisdiction' in article 1 is 'a threshold criterion', a condition necessary for a Contracting State to be held liable for acts and omissions under the Convention.⁶⁷ It reflects the concept of jurisdiction of public international law,⁶⁸ and is 'closely linked to that of the international responsibility of the State concerned'.⁶⁹ The notion of jurisdiction in article 1 applies to States. The enforcement of the Convention will be ensured, first and foremost, by the national Courts.

The term jurisdiction also appears in articles 30, 31, and 32, and in the title of article 35 of the Convention, where the context indicates it refers to the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights rather than to the jurisdiction of the Convention. Article 32 is entitled 'Jurisdiction of the Court'. It states that the Court's jurisdiction 'shall extend to all matters concerning the interpretation and application of the Convention and the Protocols thereto...' This is a different sense from that of article 1, however. Article 1 concerns the territorial (ratione loci), temporal (ratione temporis), personal (ratione personae), and subject-matter (ratione materiae) jurisdiction. Taken in that sense, the scope of the obligations under the Convention is identical to the jurisdiction of the European Court.

The Court acts where it has jurisdiction and where a case is admissible. These notions of jurisdiction and admissibility are similar but not identical. In particular, the Court should be satisfied that it has jurisdiction whether or not this matter is raised by the parties to a dispute.⁷⁰ Indeed, a State may be estopped from raising an argument about jurisdiction and yet the Court will in any case be required to consider it proprio motu. The failure of a party to proceedings to contest admissibility does not entitle the Court to proceed if it is without jurisdiction. This is because 'the scope of the Court's jurisdiction is determined by the Convention itself... and not by the parties' submissions in a particular case'.⁷¹ Otherwise, 'where a respondent State waived its right to plead or omitted to plead incompatibility, the Court would have to rule on the merits of a complaint against that State concerning a right not guaranteed by the Convention or on a Convention right not yet binding on it, for example by virtue of a valid reservation clause (incompatibility ratione materiae) or because it has not yet ratified an additional Protocol (incompatibility ratione personae)'.⁷² The notion of jurisdiction under article 1 of the Convention is not to be confused with whether or not an applicant to the Court may be considered a 'victim' of a violation. The two are 'separate and distinct admissibility conditions'.⁷³

A violation of human rights may be attributable to more than one State and possibly to factors that are in part outside the jurisdiction as defined in article 1. But 'the fact that the factual or legal situation complained of by the applicant is partly attributable to another State is not in itself decisive for the determination of the respondent State's "jurisdiction"'.⁷⁴

Although infrequent, there are cases where States parties to the Convention have broken up. Problems may arise concerning the attribution of responsibility where the alleged violation took place prior to the breakup but where the claim is being made after. The Court has taken the view that 'given the practical requirements of Article 46 of the Convention, as well as the principle that fundamental rights protected by international human rights treaties should indeed belong to individuals living in the territory of the State party concerned, notwithstanding its subsequent dissolution or succession', the Convention should apply without interruption.⁷⁵

Ratione materiae

The subject-matter or ratione materiae jurisdiction of the Court consists of the substantive provisions found in Section I of the Convention, as well as in the relevant provisions of the Protocols. Although raised as a preliminary issue concerning jurisdiction,⁷⁶ most debates about jurisdiction ratione materiae take place during the debate on the merits because they concern what is covered and what is not covered by the substantive provisions of the Convention.⁷⁷ The issue also presents itself with respect to the admissibility issue of exhaustion of domestic remedies because the applicant is required to have raised the substantive issue during domestic litigation prior to submitting a claim to the Court.⁷⁸

There are, to be sure, fundamental rights and freedoms that do not fall within the scope of the European Convention on Human Rights. This is implied in the Preamble, where it is stated that the Convention is intended 'to take the first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration'. For example, the Convention does not apply to the right to self-determination,⁷⁹ the right to political asylum,⁸⁰ or the right of foreign nationals to enter and reside within a State Party.⁸¹ These rights are not provided for in the Convention or its Protocols, although they may exist pursuant to other international human rights instruments or by virtue of customary international law. When European States present their reports to the United Nations Human Rights Council as part of the Universal Periodic Review process, they are expected to account for their observance both of treaties to which they are a party and also of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.⁸² However, the European Court of Human Rights is without any jurisdiction to rule upon violations of treaties other than the European Convention and its Protocols.⁸³

The scope ratione materiae of the Convention may also be limited where a State has made a reservation. The issue is discussed in this Commentary in the chapter on article 57 of the Convention in Section 2.III.

States parties are responsible, pursuant to article 1, for acts and omissions of their own organs regardless of whether this is a consequence of domestic law or a result of an attempt at compliance with an international legal obligation imposed by treaty or by customary law.⁸⁴

According to the Court, 'Article 1 makes no distinction as to the type of rule or measure concerned and does not exclude any part of a Contracting Party's "jurisdiction" from scrutiny under the Convention.'⁸⁵ Nevertheless, when State action is taken in order to comply with legal obligations imposed by an international organization such as the European Union, the Court will show a degree of deference or tolerance, to the extent that there is a presumption that the relevant organization protects the fundamental rights in both a substantive and procedural sense in a manner considered at least equivalent or comparable to that of the European Convention regime.⁸⁶ This presumption is rebuttable if the protection of Convention rights is 'manifestly deficient',⁸⁷ however, in light of the Convention's role as a 'constitutional instrument of European public order' in the field of human rights.⁸⁸

Ratione loci

The State's jurisdiction as this is meant by article 1 of the Convention is 'primarily territorial'.⁸⁹ There exists a presumption that jurisdiction is normally exercised throughout the territory of a State Party.⁹⁰ However, in principle the Convention 'does not require the Contracting Parties to impose its standards on third States or territories'.⁹¹ There are exceptions in two respects. Some acts that take place on the territory of a State Party are not attributable to it, for example when these are associated with international organizations, or when the perpetrator benefits from a form of immunity under international law. Then, even a positive obligation to prevent the violation cannot be imposed upon the State. Some acts that take place outside the territory of a State Party are attributable to it, principally in circumstances where a State agent exercises authority and control outside its territory, for example when it acts on the high seas, or when the State has effective control over an area, for example in a situation of military occupation.

Extradition, expulsion, and refoulement

Extraterritoriality may also arise when an act performed within the State Party has effects outside the territory. This is the case in extradition or expulsion cases, where the actual violation or threatened violation of the Convention occurs as a consequence of the conduct of a State Party but actually takes place within the third State.⁹² The responsibility of the State Party may be engaged 'on account of acts which have sufficiently proximate repercussions on rights guaranteed by the Convention, even if those repercussions occur outside its jurisdiction'.⁹³ The Court has explained:

While the establishment of the sending State's responsibility inevitably involves an assessment of conditions in the destination country against the standards set out in the Convention, there is no question of adjudicating on or establishing the responsibility of the destination country, whether under general international law, under the Convention or otherwise. In so far as any liability under the Convention is or may be incurred, it is liability incurred by the sending Contracting State by reason of its having taken action which has as a direct consequence the exposure of an individual to proscribed ill-treatment or other violations of the Convention.⁹⁴

The application of the Convention in situations where an individual who may be expelled or transferred to a third State runs a real risk of a violation of the right to life or the prohibition of ill-treatment or torture is well established.⁹⁵ If the sending State knew, or ought to have known at the relevant time, that the person being removed would be subject to 'extraordinary rendition', by which is meant 'an extra-judicial transfer of persons from one jurisdiction or State to another, for the purposes of detention and interrogation outside the normal legal system, where there was a real risk of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment', the Court has said that a possible violation of article 3 'is particularly strong and must be considered intrinsic in the transfer'.⁹⁶ Article 5 of the Convention may be violated if an individual has been removed where there is a real risk of arbitrary detention.⁹⁷ That risk is also inherent in cases of 'extraordinary rendition'.⁹⁸ Concerns about extraterritorial violations of the Convention may also arise, but only 'exceptionally', where there might be a flagrant denial of a fair trial in the third State.⁹⁹ However, the European Court will refuse to conduct any general oversight of judicial proceedings in a third State out of concerns that such a review 'would also thwart the current trend towards strengthening international cooperation in the administration of justice'.¹⁰⁰

However, the Court has refused to recognize extraterritorial jurisdiction based on a notion of effects analogous to what exists in criminal law in relation to conspiracy or complicity. Thus, the fact that a decision may have been taken within a State Party whose effects constitute a violation of the Convention does not suffice to give the Court jurisdiction over an overseas territory of the State Party if the latter has not made the declarations contemplated by article 56 of the Convention. The fact that the ultimate decision-making authority of politicians or officials lies within a State Party is 'not a sufficient ground on which to base competence under the Convention for an area otherwise outside the Convention space'.¹⁰¹ For example, in Banković, the fact that decisions about the aerial attacks on Belgrade, which was then outside 'the Convention space', were taken within European States, did not bring the NATO bombing within the competence of the Court.¹⁰²

Extradition may also involve responsibility under the Convention in cases where a State launches an extradition proceeding that results in violations of the Convention within the third State. A State Party that sets in motion a request for detention in a third State pending extradition assumes responsibility to ensure that the arrest warrant and the related materials are consistent with its own law. If it fails to do so, the blame cannot be placed on the third State, even if is a State Party to the Convention. The third State is entitled to presume the validity of the extradition request. Accordingly, an unlawful detention in Spain premised on irregular documents issued in the requesting State, Malta, was attributed to Malta, notwithstanding the fact that the actual detention took place in Spain.¹⁰³

Activities of international organizations

Although not explicitly mentioned in article 1, a State Party is not required to ensure observance of the European Convention by certain international or intergovernmental organizations that may operate on its territory.¹⁰⁴ In the Bosphorus case, the European Court said that the Convention did not 'prohibit Contracting Parties from transferring sovereign power to an international (including a supranational) organisation in order to pursue cooperation in certain fields of activity'.¹⁰⁵ Moreover, the international body to which authority is transferred 'is not itself held responsible under the Convention for proceedings before, or decisions of, its organs as long as it is not a Contracting Party'.¹⁰⁶ By way of exception to this principle, however, if the international agreement reserves to a State the right to intervene in some form despite its multilateral obligations, then it may still be held responsible for its conduct.¹⁰⁷

Several international criminal tribunals are located in Europe, almost exclusively in The Hague in The Netherlands. The proceedings before these tribunals raise many issues, notably concerning detention and procedural fairness, which are relevant to provisions of the European Convention. Indeed, the tribunals often refer to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights when they address such issues. The institutions include the International Criminal Court and several bodies established by the United Nations, notably the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, its residual 'Mechanism', and the Special Tribunal for Lebanon. At various times, the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda have also had activities in The Hague.¹⁰⁸ In addition, many European States have undertaken to detain persons convicted by these tribunals. Several individuals are currently serving sentences within the penitentiaries of States Parties to the European Convention for lengthy terms that might be deemed contrary to article 3 were they imposed pursuant to judgments of domestic tribunals.

Much earlier in time, the detention facility of the International Military Tribunal was located within a State Party. The operations of Spandau Prison, where the last remaining Nazi prisoner convicted by the Tribunal was detained, were located on the territory of Germany. However, the European Commission of Human Rights held that the Convention did not apply, dismissing an application by the wife of Nazi leader Rudolf Hess.¹⁰⁹ More recently, the European Court of Human Rights has ruled that it is without jurisdiction to consider applications that concern the activity of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. It has said that 'it is not axiomatic that a criminal trial must engage the responsibility under public international law of the State on whose territory it is held'.¹¹⁰ Similarly, it has stated that the fact someone is detained on the territory of a State Party by an international criminal tribunal 'does not of itself suffice to bring questions touching on the lawfulness of his detention within the "jurisdiction" of the Netherlands as that expression is to be understood for the purposes of Article 1 of the Convention'.¹¹¹

The Court has discussed situations where trials are held on the territory of a State but under the auspices of a foreign justice system, giving as examples the implementation of the NATO Status of Forces Agreement in various European states, as well as the trial before a Scottish court of persons accused of terrorism that actually took place within the Netherlands pursuant to a complex international agreement. Speaking of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, it said that it could not find that 'the sole fact that the [International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia] has its seat and premises in The Hague sufficient ground to attribute the matters complained of to the Kingdom of the Netherlands. In arriving at that conclusion the Court has had regard to the particular context in which the question arises before it. The Court stresses that the present case involves an international tribunal established by the Security Council of the United Nations, an international organisation founded on the principle of respect for fundamental human rights, and that moreover the basic legal provisions governing that tribunal's organisation and procedure are purposely designed to provide those indicted before it with all appropriate guarantees.'¹¹² With regard to the International Criminal Court, which has its seat in The Hague pursuant to article 3 of the Rome Statute, '[t]he Convention does not impose on a State that has agreed to host an international criminal tribunal on its territory the burden of reviewing the lawfulness of deprivation of liberty under arrangements lawfully entered into between that tribunal and States not party to it'.¹¹³ But in a case concerning service of a prison sentence pursuant to a conviction by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the Court did not object on a jurisdictional basis. It declared the application, which charged discriminatory treatment in parole eligibility, inadmissible on substantive grounds.¹¹⁴

In Bosnia and Herzegovina, the war crimes chambers of the State Courts set up under the authority of the Dayton Agreement and in pursuit of the completion strategy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia have been subject to charges that they did not operate in a manner consistent with the European Convention. The European Court of Human Rights avoided deciding whether Bosnia and Herzegovina was responsible for the court, which was 'an initiative of international institutions', by ruling a challenge ill-founded on other grounds.¹¹⁵

Territory not controlled by the State

The presumption of responsibility for acts committed on its territory may be limited in cases where a State cannot exercise authority over part of its territory. This may be the result of military occupation by another State that effectively controls the territory in question,¹¹⁶ or a consequence of acts of war or rebellion, or the acts of a foreign State supporting the installation of a separatist entity within the State Party. Although the State may not be able to fulfil all of its obligations, positive duties remain, requiring it to take all appropriate measures within its power in order to secure Convention rights in accordance with article 1.¹¹⁷ Referring to the Moldavian Republic of Transdniestria region, a pro-Russian secessionist pseudo-State, the Court has said that although Moldova lacked any effective control over the acts of the Moldavian Republic of Transdniestria, 'the fact that the region is recognised under public international law as part of Moldova's territory gives rise to an obligation, under Article 1 of the Convention, to use all legal and diplomatic means available to it to continue to guarantee the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms defined in the Convention to those living there'.¹¹⁸

Territory over which the State exercises responsibility for international relations

Article 56 of the Convention authorizes States Parties to declare that the Convention applies to a territory for which it exercises responsibility in the field of international relations. The expression is a euphemism for what has often been called the 'colonial clause'. It is discussed in detail in the chapter on article 56.

Immunity

In accordance with general international law, States recognize a range of immunities to foreign diplomats, heads of State, and functionaries of international organizations. Although responsible in a general sense for ensuring compliance by individuals within their jurisdiction, such positive obligations are reduced or eliminated where immunities are granted.¹¹⁹ Thus, while in principle a State is required to investigate violations of the right to life committed on its territory, this would not be possible in practice if a foreign embassy were involved. The European Court has explained that 'sovereign immunity is a concept of international law, developed out of the principle par in parem non habet imperium, by virtue of which one State shall not be subject to the jurisdiction of another State'. It has said that '[t]he grant of sovereign immunity to a State in civil proceedings pursues the legitimate aim of complying with international law to promote comity and good relations between States through the respect of another State's sovereignty'.¹²⁰

The Court approaches such questions not as a matter of jurisdiction but rather within the framework of restrictions or limitations. Typically, immunity raises problems with article 6 by preventing lawsuits. According to the Court, 'measures taken by a State which reflect generally recognised rules of public international law on State immunity cannot in principle be regarded as imposing a disproportionate restriction on the right of access to a court as embodied in Article 6 § 1'.¹²¹

Extraterritorial jurisdiction

Exceptionally, a State Party may incur liability under article 1 of the Convention for acts that it actually perpetrates outside its territory. This 'was not foreseen—indeed, might well have been met with astonishment—when the Convention was drafted'.¹²² It may well be that the extraterritorial activity of a given State is conducted with the consent, invitation, or acquiescence of the State that is actually sovereign. Even then, in cases where 'in accordance with custom, treaty or other agreement, authorities of the Contracting State carry out executive or judicial functions on the territory of another State, the Contracting State may be responsible for breaches of the Convention thereby incurred, as long as the acts in question are attributable to it rather than to the territorial State'.¹²³

As a general rule, the Convention does not apply to acts or threats in a third State if an individual has left a State Party voluntarily. Indeed, in addressing issues of extraterritorial application 'there is no principled reason to distinguish between, on the one hand, someone who was in the jurisdiction of a Contracting State but voluntarily left that jurisdiction and, on the other, someone who was never in the jurisdiction of that State'.¹²⁴ As a result, immigration authorities within a Convention State need not consider a threat of torture or violation of the right to life if the individual in question is abroad, in a third State, something that would imply 'an unlimited obligation on Contracting States to allow entry to an individual who might be at real risk of ill-treatment contrary to Article 3, regardless of where in the world that individual might find himself'.¹²⁵

State agent authority and control

A State Party may be liable for a violation of the Convention rights and freedoms of persons that occurs outside the territory where the perpetrators are under its authority and control.¹²⁶ In such situations, accountability 'stems from the fact that Article 1 of the Convention cannot be interpreted so as to allow a State party to perpetrate violations of the Convention on the territory of another State, which it could not perpetrate on its own territory'.¹²⁷ It does not matter whether or not the State's agents are acting outside their authority, or even unlawfully. On this point, the Court has referred to the International Law Commission Articles on State Responsibility, whereby 'a State's authorities are strictly liable for the conduct of their subordinates; they are under a duty to impose their will and cannot shelter behind their inability to ensure that it is respected'.¹²⁸

Use of force by agents of the State operating outside its territory may engage the responsibility of a State Party to the Convention. The Court has said that 'whenever the State through its agents exercises control and authority over an individual, and thus jurisdiction, the State is under an obligation under Article 1 to secure to that individual the rights and freedoms under Section 1 of the Convention that are relevant to the situation of that individual'.¹²⁹ According to the Court, '[w]hat is decisive in such cases is the exercise of physical power and control over the person in question'.¹³⁰ For example, when Turkish agents were given custody over Abdullah Öcalan by Kenyan authorities, 'the applicant was effectively under Turkish authority and therefore within the "jurisdiction" of that State for the purposes of Article 1 of the Convention, even though in this instance Turkey exercised its authority outside its territory'.¹³¹ In Issa and Others, Turkish soldiers had taken individuals into custody and then murdered them; although all of the relevant events took place in Northern Iraq, this was held to be an exercise of jurisdiction subject to article 1 by Turkey.¹³² Iraqi nationals detained in military prisons within Iraq that were controlled by British forces were also protected by the European Convention.¹³³

In an Italian case, the Court acknowledged the application of the Convention when the alleged violation took place on board military ships flying the Italian flag.¹³⁴ It said that Italy could not avoid jurisdiction under the Convention by describing the events as rescue operations conducted on the high seas.¹³⁵ This is really no more than application of the general rule that States normally exercise territorial jurisdiction over ships and aircraft flying their flag.¹³⁶ Under international law, vessels sailing on the high seas are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the flag State.¹³⁷ Customary international law recognizes the validity of the exercise of universal jurisdiction on board such vessels, both ships and aircraft.¹³⁸

But even when the events took place in international waters on a ship flagged in Cambodia, the Court found that French drug enforcement officials were exercising jurisdiction within the meaning of article 1 of the Convention. In that case, a French frigate named the Lieutenant de vaisseau Le Hénaff had boarded the Winner, taking control of the vessel, detaining the crew, and sailing it to France. The Court held that France had 'exercised full and exclusive control over the Winner and its crew, at least de facto, from the time of its interception, in a continuous and uninterrupted manner until they were tried in France', putting the alleged victims under French jurisdiction for the purposes of Article 1 of the Convention.¹³⁹

Extraterritorial exercise of jurisdiction by a State undertaken by diplomatic or consular agents is recognized by customary international law.¹⁴⁰

Effective control over an area

The Convention may also apply extraterritorially when a State Party exercises effective control over an area outside its national territory. This will generally occur as a consequence of military occupation. This is a question of fact, and 'the status of "occupying power" within the meaning of Article 42 of the Hague Regulations, or lack of it, is not per se determinative'.¹⁴¹ In such cases, the obligation under article 1 of the Convention derives from the fact of such control, whether it be exercised directly, through the Contracting State's own armed forces, or through a subordinate local administration.¹⁴²

It is not necessary to establish whether the State actually exercises detailed control over the policies and actions of the authorities in the occupied area.¹⁴³ The responsibility extends beyond the acts of the State's own soldiers or officials to the local administration that may have survived and that continues to operate with the support or tolerance of the military occupier.¹⁴⁴ With effective control by military occupation goes an 'obligation to secure, in such an area, the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention.'¹⁴⁵ In other words, the State Party must ensure both the positive and negative dimensions of rights. Obligations upon the occupying power to protect fundamental rights also exist pursuant to the laws of armed conflict.¹⁴⁶

Whether or not a State exercises effective control over an area outside its own national territory is a question of fact.¹⁴⁷ Relevant factors in assessing whether the State Party exercises effective control will include the strength of the military presence, as well as the extent to which the military, economic, and political support for the local subordinate administration provides it with influence and control over the region.¹⁴⁸ Effective control may be combined with 'decisive influence'.¹⁴⁹ There is no need to determine whether the State Party exercises detailed control over the policies and acts of the local administration because its existence and survival as a consequence of the military occupation is sufficient to engage the jurisdiction of the occupying State.¹⁵⁰ The State's responsibility under the Convention covers the territory of the State, subject to exceptions for the activities of international organizations and certain immunities under international law. It also extends to territory effectively controlled by the State, such as territory under military occupation.¹⁵¹

The Court has declined to recognize the application of article 1 to all acts of armed conflict that take place outside the territory. In a case concerning bombing of Serbia by NATO forces, it held that the Convention did not apply when 'an instantaneous extra-territorial act is at issue, since the wording of Article 1 does not accommodate such an approach to "jurisdiction"'.¹⁵² But in a case involving a demonstration that took place in the United Nations buffer zone located between the territory of Cyprus controlled by the government and the territory occupied by Turkey, the Court considered that Turkey could be deemed to have a sufficient degree of 'effective control' when its police beat to death a Greek-Cypriot demonstrator within the buffer zone.¹⁵³

The Court has made an important distinction respecting extraterritorial control by a State Party. This is related to the idea of the 'legal space' (or espace juridique) of the Convention.¹⁵⁴ In such cases, 'the occupying State should in principle be held accountable under the Convention for breaches of human rights within the occupied territory, because to hold otherwise would be to deprive the population of that territory of the rights and freedoms hitherto enjoyed and would result in a "vacuum" of protection within the "Convention legal space"'.¹⁵⁵

The extension of jurisdiction to territory over which a State exercises 'effective control' is difficult to reconcile with article 56 of the Convention. Drafted at a time when many States in Western Europe still had extensive colonial empires, article 56 enabled them to extend the benefit of the Convention to what were euphemistically described as 'territories for whose international relations they were responsible'. Put otherwise, it meant that the Convention did not automatically and as of right apply to the non-metropolitan territories of a State Party. Although the empires are greatly diminished, several States Parties continue to control territories that are far from the European continent. It does not make much sense for them to issue a declaration under article 56 if the benefit of the Convention has already been extended to the territory in question because of the extraterritorial 'effective control' notion that results from the interpretation of article 1.

In Al-Skeini v. the United Kingdom, the Grand Chamber insisted that the 'effective control' principle of jurisdiction did not replace the system of declarations provided for by article 56 of the Convention.¹⁵⁶ In another case, dealing with the displaced Chagos islanders, a Chamber wrote: 'Anachronistic as colonial remnants may be, the meaning of Article 56 is plain on its face and it cannot be ignored merely because of a perceived need to right an injustice. Article 56 remains a provision of the Convention which is in force and cannot be abrogated at will by the Court in order to reach a purportedly desirable result.'¹⁵⁷ In another case directed against the United Kingdom, the Court held that the existence of effective control over a territory did not provide a basis of jurisdiction replacing the system of declarations contemplated by article 56.¹⁵⁸ The situation that results is quite paradoxical. States with dependent territories, like the United Kingdom, are only responsible under the Convention with respect to those territories if they have made a declaration under article 56. But if they occupy a territory militarily they are automatically responsible under the Convention.

Diplomatic protection

Diplomatic protection, by which a State attempts to promote and enforce the rights of its nationals with respect to the conduct of another State, is a significant aspect of the application of international human rights law.¹⁵⁹ Within the States Parties to the Convention, this extraterritorial dimension of the protection of human rights may manifest itself, albeit very occasionally, in inter-State applications¹⁶⁰ and in the right of a State Party to intervene when one of its nationals is an applicant against another State Party, in accordance with article 36(1) of the Convention.¹⁶¹ The Convention organs have declined to recognize that the Convention offers any right of a citizen of a State Party to the exercise of diplomatic protection on his or her behalf.¹⁶²

Ratione personae

The obligations set out in article 1 are only imposed upon 'High Contracting Parties'. As an instrument of European public order,¹⁶³ the Convention 'does not govern the actions of States not Parties to it, nor does it purport to be a means of requiring the Contracting States to impose Convention standards on other States'.¹⁶⁴ It does not apply to third States,¹⁶⁵ although the latter's conduct in the area of human rights may present itself indirectly in cases of extradition or expulsion, a matter discussed earlier in this chapter.

The Convention obligations are not imposed upon individuals,¹⁶⁶ although the State may be held responsible in the sense of a positive obligation for the conduct of individuals. Issues of jurisdiction ratione personae generally arise in the case of positive obligations because they concern whether or not responsibility can be attributed to the State Party for the acts of others. In the case of obligations upon the State for its own acts and legislation, and that of organs and institutions within the State structure, there can be no serious objection to the jurisdiction ratione personae.

Nor do the obligations under the Convention apply to international organizations, even if the organizations are themselves composed of States Parties to the Convention.¹⁶⁷

Nevertheless, there is a kind of reduced or 'light' positive obligation on States when they delegate or assign responsibilities to an international organization in the sense that they must ensure a certain level of compliance with the Convention. This is because 'absolving Contracting States completely from their Convention responsibility in the areas covered by such a transfer would be incompatible with the purpose and object of the Convention; the guarantees of the Convention could be limited or excluded at will, thereby depriving it of its peremptory character and undermining the practical and effective nature of its safeguards'.¹⁶⁸

In the past, the Convention organs have refused to consider European Union bodies as falling within the jurisdiction ratione personae,¹⁶⁹ something that will obviously change with the accession of the European Union to the Convention in accordance with article 59(2). As for the United Nations, it is 'an intergovernmental international organisation with a legal personality separate from that of its member states and is not itself a Contracting Party'.¹⁷⁰ The Court has operated a distinction between the activities of the United Nations and those of its subordinate bodies, such as the United Nations Mission in Kosovo and the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, and acts carried out by States Parties but pursuant to obligations imposed by the United Nations Security Council. In the latter case, there can be no objection ratione personae to jurisdiction under the Convention.¹⁷¹

Where peacekeeping activities of European States in Kosovo were concerned, pursuant to a Security Council mandate, the Court considered that this was less a question of exercise of extraterritorial control and more one of the participation within a joint force; consequently, the debate was primarily one of ratione personae.¹⁷² The Chamber noted that a central issue was the relationship between the European Convention and the United Nations acting under Chapter VII of its Charter. It said such peacekeeping operations were fundamental to the mission of the United Nations and that acts and omissions of States Parties to the European Convention that were 'covered by' Security Council Resolutions were outside the jurisdiction of the Convention. It said the reasoning also applied to voluntary acts of States Parties, for example the vote of a permanent member of the Security Council and a contribution of troops to a security mission.

Although such acts may not have flowed from membership in the United Nations, they 'remained crucial to the effective fulfilment' of a Chapter VII initiative and thereby the 'imperative peace and security aim' of the organization.¹⁷³ The Chamber noted that nine of the twelve original signatories to the Convention had been founding members of the United Nations and that the great majority of States Parties to the Convention had joined the United Nations prior to signing the Convention. Aside from this general attachment to the United Nations, the Chamber also noted the imperative nature of the 'principle [sic] aim' of the United Nations, the maintenance of international peace, and security.¹⁷⁴ In a subsequent decision, a Chamber of the Court held it was without jurisdiction ratione materiae with regard to decisions of the High Representative, who was mandated by the Security Council to act as the interim administrator of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Chamber said that the Security Council retained 'effective overall control' over the High Representative and that as a consequence his decisions could not be attributed to Bosnia and Herzegovina, a State Party to the European Convention.¹⁷⁵ The High Representative 'was exercising lawfully delegated [United Nations Security Council] Chapter VII powers, so that the impugned action was, in principle, "attributable" to the UN'.¹⁷⁶

Ratione temporis

From the moment that it enters into force for any given State, the European Convention applies immediately. There is an obligation upon the State Party to 'secure to everyone' the rights and freedoms set out in Section I of the Convention. Beginning with this 'critical date', all of the State's acts and omissions 'not only must conform to the Convention but are also undoubtedly subject to review by the Convention institutions'.¹⁷⁷ The corollary to this is rooted in the presumption that international treaties do not operate retroactively unless a different intention appears from the treaty or is otherwise established. Consequently, the treaty provisions 'do not bind a party in relation to any act or fact which took place or any situation which ceased to exist before the date of the entry into force of the treaty with respect to that party'.¹⁷⁸ According to the Court, 'the Convention imposes no specific obligation on the Contracting States to provide redress for wrongs or damage caused prior to that date'.¹⁷⁹ The Grand Chamber has stated that this principle is 'beyond dispute'.¹⁸⁰

There is a special application of this in the case of inter-State applications submitted pursuant to article 33. The applicant State may invoke a violation by another State that occurred prior to entry into force of the Convention for the applicant State. That the respondent State was undoubtedly bound to respect the Convention at the relevant time is undisputed. Whether or not the Convention also applied to the applicant State is not relevant because it is said to be acting not in its own interest but rather in the enforcement of the 'public order of Europe'. The European Commission also rejected the charge that applying the Convention in this way might appear unfair, answering that the applicant State was also vulnerable to such applications with respect to the period subsequent to its acceptance of the Convention. '[I]f the High Contracting Parties had wished to make the right to file a complaint under article [33] subject to a condition of reciprocity in regard to the element of time, it was open to them to insert an express condition to that effect in Article [33], but they did not do so', opined the Commission.¹⁸¹

In principle, the 'critical date' is that of entry into force of the Convention or the Protocols for the State Party concerned.¹⁸² The Convention entered into force on 3 September 1953 following the deposit of the tenth ratification by a Member State of the Council of Europe, as provided for by article 59(3) of the Convention. For States that have ratified or acceded to the Convention subsequent to that date, the Convention enters into force on the date of deposit of its instrument of ratification or accession with the Secretary General of the Council of Europe, pursuant to article 59(4). For the Protocols, the rules concerning entry into force are similar, although there are some minor variations.

Prior to 1998 and the entry into force of Protocol No. 11, there was a distinction between application of the Convention itself and the jurisdiction of the European Commission and the European Court to examine applications. It was possible for the Convention to be applicable, yet for the Convention organs to be without jurisdiction because the relevant declarations had not been made. Some States made declarations accepting the competence of the Commission and the Court but subject to temporal limitations.¹⁸³

The temporal scope of the Convention is determined with regard to the facts that are responsible for the alleged interference with fundamental rights and freedoms. In order to bring a case before the European Court, the victim must first attempt to remedy the situation in domestic proceedings. However, the failure of such domestic remedies to redress the situation does not alter the 'critical date' for the establishment of temporal jurisdiction. This remains the date of the interference as such.¹⁸⁴

In the exercise of a remedy for an interference with a fundamental right, violations of the right to a fair trial may take place. The procedural violation is the 'critical date' for the purposes of the Convention.¹⁸⁵ In some cases, the alleged interference with fundamental rights may well be the final judgment of a national court. Then, the 'critical date' for determining the application of the Convention is that of the judgment, that is, the date that the issue becomes res judicata.¹⁸⁶ If there is a subsequent decision by a Court that allows the impugned judgment to subsist, it will not have the consequence of changing the 'critical date'.¹⁸⁷ Temporal jurisdiction issues arise with respect to the right to a speedy trial where the lengthy proceedings began before the 'critical date' but continued after.¹⁸⁸

The rule against retroactivity does not prevent consideration of facts that arose before the entry into force of the Convention for the State in question, in particular where these have created a continuing situation of violation of the Convention¹⁸⁹ or where they are necessary for the understanding of facts that are subsequent to the entry into force.¹⁹⁰ A continuing violation may take place in cases concerning the right to property, for example where there is on-going unlawful occupation,¹⁹¹ denial of access to property,¹⁹² and failure to pay compensation in cases of nationalization.¹⁹³ However, the mere deprivation of property is an 'instantaneous act' that does not create a situation of continuous interference with the right.¹⁹⁴ This exception applies to expropriation measures connected with post-Second-World-War regulation of ownership relations.¹⁹⁵ What has been called 'erasure', a situation in which an individual becomes effectively stateless, has been treated as a continuing interference with private or family life, even if the 'erasure' itself occurred before the 'critical date'.¹⁹⁶

The 'continuing' procedural obligation exists where there is a situation of disappearance that occurred before the 'critical date'. According to the Grand Chamber:

A disappearance is a distinct phenomenon, characterised by an on-going situation of uncertainty and unaccountability in which there is a lack of information or even a deliberate concealment and obfuscation of what has occurred. This situation is very often drawn out over time, prolonging the torment of the victim's relatives. It cannot therefore be said that a disappearance is, simply, an 'instantaneous' act or event; the additional distinctive element of subsequent failure to account for the whereabouts and fate of the missing person gives rise to a continuing situation. Thus, the procedural obligation will, potentially, persist as long as the fate of the person is unaccounted for;

the on-going failure to provide the requisite investigation will be regarded as a continuing violation. This is so, even where death may, eventually, be presumed.¹⁹⁷

Imposition of a death sentence prior to the 'critical date', to the extent that it has not been set aside, constitutes a continuous violation.¹⁹⁸

Exceptionally, the Court may take into account facts that took place prior to the 'critical date' in considering the procedural obligation associated with certain fundamental rights, notably those in articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. For example, where a substantive violation of the right to life has taken place prior to the 'critical date', the Convention may nevertheless apply to the duty of the State Party to conduct an investigation and to ensure that measures of accountability exist. In disappearance cases, even if the body has been found, '[t]his only casts light on one aspect of the fate of the missing person and the obligation to account for the disappearance and death, as well as to identify and prosecute any perpetrator of unlawful acts in that connection, will generally remain'.¹⁹⁹ In an article 6 case dealing with criminal proceedings that had started prior to the critical date but that continued after it, the Court considered the proceedings as a whole in assessing the issue of fairness. The Court was evaluating safeguards at an early stage in the criminal proceedings so as to assess whether they made up for problems at the trial stage.²⁰⁰

In Blečić v. Croatia, the Grand Chamber held that where the interference with a right took place prior to the 'critical date' and where a refusal to remedy this occurred subsequently, 'to retain the date of the latter act in determining the Court's temporal jurisdiction would result in the Convention being binding for that State in relation to a fact that had taken place before the Convention came into force in respect of that State. However, this would be contrary to the general rule of non-retroactivity of treaties'.²⁰¹ The Grand Chamber explained that 'affording a remedy usually presupposes a finding that the interference was unlawful under the law in force when the interference occurred (tempus regit actum). Therefore, any attempt to remedy, on the basis of the Convention, an interference that had ended before the Convention came into force would necessarily lead to its retroactive application'.²⁰²

Where a procedural right is recognized explicitly, as in article 5(5), it does not fall under the Convention if the infringement on liberty took place before the 'critical date'.²⁰³ But the right to compensation for wrongful conviction, enshrined article 3 of Protocol No. 7, exists as long as the judgment quashing the conviction is after the 'critical date'.²⁰⁴ If the exercise of the remedy has already begun prior to the 'critical date' and where it continues after, the Court has considered that there is some room for application of the Convention.

Following divergences in the case law of the Chambers,²⁰⁵ in 2009 in Šilih v. Slovenia the Grand Chamber confronted the temporal jurisdiction issue with respect to the procedural obligation in a case dealing with medical malpractice. It opted for the more generous approach by which there was a procedural obligation pursuant to article 2 of the Convention, even if the actual killing took place prior to the entry into force of the Convention for the respondent State. By fifteen votes to two, the Grand Chamber held that 'the procedural obligation to carry out an effective investigation under Article 2 has evolved into a separate and autonomous duty' that constitutes 'a detachable obligation arising out of Article 2 capable of binding the State even when the death took place before the critical date'.²⁰⁶ Nevertheless, the Court said that 'having regard to the principle of legal certainty' this extension of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court was 'not opened'.²⁰⁷ The Grand Chamber explained the limitations it was placing on the procedural obligation:

162. First, it is clear that, where the death occurred before the critical date, only procedural acts and/or omissions occurring after that date can fall within the Court's temporal jurisdiction.

163. Second, there must exist a genuine connection between the death and the entry into force of the Convention in respect of the respondent State for the procedural obligations imposed by Article 2 to come into effect. Thus a significant proportion of the procedural steps required by this provision—which include not only an effective investigation into the death of the person concerned but also the institution of appropriate proceedings for the purpose of determining the cause of the death and holding those responsible to account—will have been or ought to have been carried out after the critical date. However, the Court would not exclude that in certain circumstances the connection could also be based on the need to ensure that the guarantees and the underlying values of the Convention are protected in a real and effective manner.²⁰⁸

In this way, the Grand Chamber established an exception within an exception. The Court could only exercise jurisdiction with respect to a violation of the procedural obligation contained in article 2 if a 'significant proportion of the procedural steps' had been undertaken after the 'critical date'. However, this requirement could be waived if 'certain circumstances' required the Court 'to ensure that the guarantees and the underlying values of the Convention are protected in a real and effective manner'. This 'underlying values' exception has sometimes been called the 'humanitarian clause'.²⁰⁹

The scope of the 'humanitarian clause' was subsequently constrained by the Grand Chamber in Janowiec v. Russia in accordance with article 43 of the Convention. According to the Grand Chamber, the Court could not consider the 'underlying values' exception if the loss of life had taken place prior to 4 November 1950. It held that

The first step in the diagnosis of a patient with a suspected diagnosis of a disease is to obtain a detailed history and perform a physical examination. The history should include the onset and duration of symptoms, the nature of the symptoms, and any previous medical history. The physical examination should include a general examination and a detailed examination of the affected area.

The next step is to perform a complete blood count (CBC) and a urinalysis. The CBC will provide information about the number of red blood cells, white blood cells, and platelets. The urinalysis will provide information about the presence of red blood cells, white blood cells, and other substances in the urine.

If the results of the CBC and urinalysis are abnormal, the next step is to perform a more detailed physical examination and a series of laboratory tests. These tests may include a complete metabolic panel (CMP), a thyroid panel, and a series of blood and urine tests.

If the results of these tests are still abnormal, the next step is to perform a series of imaging studies. These studies may include a chest X-ray, a CT scan, and an MRI scan.

If the results of these imaging studies are still abnormal, the next step is to perform a series of invasive procedures. These procedures may include a biopsy, a lumbar puncture, and a series of other tests.

If the results of these procedures are still abnormal, the next step is to perform a series of genetic tests. These tests may include a karyotype, a series of DNA tests, and a series of other tests.

If the results of these genetic tests are still abnormal, the next step is to perform a series of psychological tests. These tests may include a series of personality tests, a series of cognitive tests, and a series of other tests.

If the results of these psychological tests are still abnormal, the next step is to perform a series of other tests. These tests may include a series of blood and urine tests, a series of imaging studies, and a series of other tests.

SECTION I
RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

Article 2. Right to life/Droit à la vie

1. Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

2. Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as inflicted in contravention of this article when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary:

- (a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
- (b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained;
- (c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection.

1. Le droit de toute personne à la vie est protégé par la loi. La mort ne peut être infligée à quiconque intentionnellement, sauf en exécution d'une sentence capitale prononcée par un tribunal au cas où le délit est puni de cette peine par la loi.

2. La mort n'est pas considérée comme infligée en violation de cet article dans les cas où elle résulterait d'un recours à la force rendu absolument nécessaire:

- a) pour assurer la défense de toute personne contre la violence illégale;
- b) pour effectuer une arrestation régulière ou pour empêcher l'évasion d'une personne régulièrement détenue;
- c) pour réprimer, conformément à la loi, une émeute ou une insurrection.

Introductory comments

The 'right to life' has been described as 'the supreme right',¹ 'one of the most important rights',² and as 'one of the rights which constitute the irreducible core of human rights'.³ Basic as it appears, it is at the same time intangible in scope and vexingly difficult to define with precision. Its content is continuously evolving, in step with the hegemony of ever more progressive attitudes to capital punishment, nuclear arms, abortion, and euthanasia, to mention only a few of the many issues that have figured in the interpretation and application of article 2 of the European Convention. The case law is almost entirely of recent vintage. The European Court of Human Rights did not issue a decision on the merits with respect to article 2 of the Convention until 1995.⁴ At the time, the European Commission of Human Rights, which by then had been in operation for four decades, had yet to make a finding of a violation of article 2. In 1996, the Commission held that the right to life had been violated in a case involving the use of lethal force by the authorities.⁵

In its final years, the Commission concluded that the right to life had been violated in a string of Turkish cases.⁶

The right to life, enshrined in article 2, is often linked with the prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, set out in article 3. The two provisions confront some of the most dire threats to bodily integrity. The relationship is not without its mysteries, however. Article 3 is often presented as an absolute prohibition. It is so fundamental that it brooks no exceptions. By contrast, a mere reading of article 2 indicates the central role that exceptions play in our understanding of the right to life. The State cannot torture but it can kill, in a myriad of ways, including law enforcement, military action, and the death penalty. It cannot permit others to torture, yet it can permit deprivations of the right to life by others, in the course of self-defence, or negligent acts and even, perhaps, in the exercise of mercy.

Although it was recognized in national constitutions as early as the eighteenth century, the first formulations of the right to life in international law appear in some of the post-First-World-War treaties. For example, the treaty that revived the State of Poland out of the remnants of the Russian, Prussian, and Austrian empires began, in article 2, with the following: 'Poland undertakes to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Poland without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race or religion.'⁷ The direct ancestor of article 2 is, of course, article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: 'Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.' Article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights develops more detailed norms on certain aspects of the right to life:

1. Every human being has the inherent right to life. This right shall be protected by law. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life.
2. In countries which have not abolished the death penalty, sentence of death may be imposed only for the most serious crimes in accordance with the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime and not contrary to the provisions of the present Covenant and to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. This penalty can only be carried out pursuant to a final judgment rendered by a competent court.
3. When deprivation of life constitutes the crime of genocide, it is understood that nothing in this article shall authorize any State Party to the present Covenant to derogate in any way from any obligation assumed under the provisions of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.
4. Anyone sentenced to death shall have the right to seek pardon or commutation of the sentence. Amnesty, pardon or commutation of the sentence of death may be granted in all cases.
5. Sentence of death shall not be imposed for crimes committed by persons below eighteen years of age and shall not be carried out on pregnant women.
6. Nothing in this article shall be invoked to delay or to prevent the abolition of capital punishment by any State Party to the present Covenant.

The Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights has noted that 'the pre-eminence of the right to life' has been constantly reaffirmed in relevant conventions and instruments, citing in this respect article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as well as article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.⁸ The convergence of these instruments on the subject is 'significant' as it 'indicates that the right to life is an inalienable attribute of human beings and forms the supreme value in the hierarchy of human rights'.⁹

The European Charter of Fundamental Rights proclaims the right to life in the following terms:

Article 2. Right to life

1. Everyone has the right to life.
2. No one shall be condemned to the death penalty, or executed.

The provision is meant to have the same meaning and scope as article 2 of the European Convention.¹⁰

Drafting of the provision

The initial draft European Convention on Human Rights was prepared by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement, chaired by Pierre-Henri Teitgen, with David Maxwell Fyfe and Fernand Dehousse as rapporteurs. Both Maxwell Fyfe and Dehousse had been involved in the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations the previous year. But contrary to what might have been expected, this first draft of the European Convention did not closely follow the right to life provision in the Universal Declaration ('Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person'). The enumeration of rights in the draft began: 'Every State a party to this Convention shall guarantee to all persons within its territory the following rights: a) Security of life and limb.'¹¹

Asked to prepare a text for discussion in the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions at the first session of the Consultative Assembly, held from 22 August to 5 September 1949, Teitgen proposed the following: 'Security of person, in accordance with Articles 3, 5 and 8 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations General Assembly.'¹² At its sitting of 29 August 1949, the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions accepted inclusion of 'the safety of the person, as laid down in Articles 3, 5 and 8 of the Universal Declaration on [sic] Human Rights'.¹³ The word 'safety' was an awkward translation of the French sûreté and was changed to 'security', the term used in article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in the final report adopted by the Committee: 'Security of person, in accordance with Articles 3, 5 and 8 of the United Nations Declaration'.¹⁴ The Consultative Assembly adopted the text proposed by the Committee.¹⁵

At the first meeting of the Committee of Experts, the United Kingdom tabled a more elaborate text containing an autonomous right to life provision and making specific provision for use of the death penalty:

1. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of the sentence of the court following his conviction of a crime for which his penalty is defined by law.
2. Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as intentional when it results from the use of force, which is no more than absolutely necessary
 - a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
 - b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent an escape from lawful custody,
 - c) any action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection or for prohibiting entry to clearly defined places to which access is forbidden on grounds of national security.¹⁶

The provision was almost identical to a proposal for the right to life provision of the draft covenant that had been submitted by the United Kingdom to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.¹⁷ But at the conclusion of its first session, the Committee of Experts adopted a text derived from article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: 'Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.'¹⁸ At the second session of the Committee of Experts, in March 1950, the United Kingdom representative submitted a slightly different proposal, with minor changes that were entirely stylistic:

1. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is defined by law.
2. Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as intentional when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary
 - a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
 - b) in order to effect lawful arrest or to prevent an escape from lawful custody,
 - c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection or for prohibiting entry to a clearly defined place to which access is forbidden on grounds of national security.¹⁹

The Committee of Experts concluded its work with the submission to the Committee of Ministers of two different drafts. The first, 'Alternatives A and A/2', consisted of the laconic text adopted by the Committee of Experts at the first session.²⁰ The second, labelled 'Alternatives B and B/2', contained the text that had been proposed by the United Kingdom.²¹

The Conference of Senior Officials that convened in June 1950 assigned a Drafting Committee to attempt to reconcile the competing versions. It prepared a new formulation of the right to life with a first paragraph that was inspired by the text of article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, followed by a slightly modified version of the British proposal in the Committee of Experts. In particular, the reference at the very end of the British text to the prohibition of entry on grounds of national security was removed:

1. Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law.
2. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally, save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.
3. Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as a contravention of the preceding paragraph when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary:
 - a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
 - b) in order to effect lawful arrest or to prevent an escape from lawful custody,
 - c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection.²²

The Conference adopted it without change.²³

The draft text of article 2 was modified slightly by a Sub-Committee of the Committee of Ministers at its fifth session, in early August 1950. The text in the first paragraph was combined with the second paragraph. The words 'as a contravention of the preceding paragraph' in paragraph 3 were changed to 'in contravention of this Article'. With these changes accepted, the Committee of Ministers adopted the revised text of article 2.²⁴

There were no further modifications of the text, and the version confirmed at the fifth session of the Committee of Ministers is the definitive one. During the August 1950 session of the Consultative Assembly, Giovanni Persico of Italy described the right-to-life provision as 'the basic Article of the Convention'. He said '[t]hat is as it should be', but went on to insist that 'something else needed to be added'. He proposed that the right-to-life provision be followed by a distinct article setting out the following: 'Genocide, whether committed in time of peace or war, is a crime under International Law, the perpetrators of which must be charged and punished in accordance with the Convention approved by UNO on 9 December 1948.²⁵ Persico later withdrew the amendment on the condition that reference was made to it in the report.²⁶ In effect, the report refers to the motion, noting that 'every speaker expressed his abhorrence of the crime' of genocide but that 'the Committee thought that at present that subject could be more suitably dealt with by a motion in the Assembly'.²⁷

The heading of article 2 ('Right to life/Droit à la vie') was added pursuant to the provisions of Protocol No. 11.²⁸

Analysis and interpretation

Article 2 has been described by the Court as one of 'the most fundamental provisions in the Convention', a text that 'enshrine[s] the basic values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe'.²⁹ It is to be interpreted and applied 'so as to make its safeguards practical and effective'.³⁰ The Court must be 'especially vigilant' in right-to-life cases.³¹ The Grand Chamber has spoken of 'the principle of strict proportionality inherent in Article 2'.³²

The first paragraph of article 2 sets out the general principle of the protection of the right to life: 'Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law.' It also specifies, in the second sentence, that intentional deprivation of life is not permitted 'save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law'. Thus, paragraph 1 of article 2 has both positive and negative dimensions. Not only must the State refrain from 'intentionally' depriving a person of life, it must also 'take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction'.³³ This 'flows from the wording and structure of Article 2'.³⁴ Paragraph 1 addresses substantive violations of the right to life when persons are killed or when loss of life is threatened. It also has a procedural dimension, requiring the State to conduct investigations into killings and, where appropriate, to proceed with criminal justice and other measures to deal with those responsible. Paragraph 1 contemplates the death penalty as the sole exception to the principles that it sets out.

Paragraph 2 lists three additional exceptions to the first sentence of article 2(1). These three enumerated exceptions are not primarily concerned with permissible intentional killing but rather with the use of force that is necessary for legitimate ends but that may have deprivation of life as an unintended outcome.³⁵ Use of lethal force within the context of paragraph 2 must be no more than is 'absolutely necessary' to achieve the purpose.³⁶

The applicable standard of proof under article 2 is 'beyond reasonable doubt'.³⁷ This formulation is familiar to jurists, especially from common law systems, and it has been incorporated into the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.³⁸ But when the European Court refers to 'beyond reasonable doubt', it is not borrowing the notion from national legal systems. The Court rules on the responsibility of States under the Convention and on criminal guilt or civil liability.³⁹ Evidence that meets the reasonable doubt standard may 'follow from the coexistence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences or of similar unrebutted presumptions of fact. In this context, the conduct of the parties when evidence is being obtained has to be taken into account.'⁴⁰ Some right-to-life cases do not 'lend themselves to a rigorous application of the principle whereby a person who alleges something must prove that allegation'.⁴¹ Thus, the burden of proof will shift depending upon the circumstances. According to the Court, 'where the events in issue lie wholly or in large part within the exclusive knowledge of the authorities, as in the case of persons under their control in detention, strong presumptions of fact will arise in respect of injuries and death occurring during that detention. The burden of proof may be regarded as resting on the authorities to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation.'⁴² If the authorities do not provide full access to information in their control, the Court may draw inferences from the government's conduct.⁴³ Presumptions are of special importance with respect to article 2 in forced disappearance cases.⁴⁴ When an individual is taken into custody by the authorities, the failure to provide 'a plausible explanation as to a detainee's fate, in the absence of a body' may, depending upon the circumstances of the case, support the presumption of death.⁴⁵ The period of time in detention is relevant, although not decisive. Certainly, 'the more time goes by without any news of the detained person, the greater the likelihood that he or she has died'.⁴⁶

'Everyone': Beneficiaries of the right to life

Article 2 begins with the word 'Everyone's' (toute personne). The word is used in several other provisions of the Convention affirming fundamental rights. The principal reference here is article 1, which secures the rights in the Convention to 'everyone', but the term is also used in articles 5, 6, 8–11, and 13. It has particular salience with respect to the right to life because of the debate about whether it extends to the unborn child. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights hints at an exclusion of the unborn in the opening words of article 1: 'All human beings are born...' But article 25(2) of the Declaration might be taken to imply the opposite in its reference to the protection of 'motherhood'. By contrast with the European Convention, article 4 of the American Convention on Human Rights protects life 'in general, from the moment of conception', as the European Court of Human Rights has observed.⁴⁷

According to the Court, it is 'neither desirable nor possible to answer the question of whether the unborn was a person for the purposes of Article 2 of the Convention'.⁴⁸ In a very early decision, the European Commission of Human Rights suggested that the right to life of the foetus might be protected by article 2 'in certain circumstances... notwithstanding that there is in the Contracting States a considerable divergence of views on whether or to what extent Article 2 protects the unborn life'.⁴⁹ Later, it declined to take a firm view on whether article 2 applied to the unborn child, although it said that both the general usage of the term 'everyone' in the Convention and the context of article 2 'tend to support the view that it does not include the unborn'.⁵⁰ It excluded an interpretation of article 2 by which it provided the foetus with an 'absolute' right to life.⁵¹ The European Commission considered that even if the foetus was protected by article 2, this could not outweigh the right to life of the mother, which was also entitled to protection,⁵² a position confirmed by the Court.⁵³ The Grand Chamber has held that stored embryos not yet implanted in the uterus cannot benefit from the protection of article 2.⁵⁴

The current position is that 'the issue of when the right to life begins comes within the margin of appreciation which the Court generally considers that States should enjoy in this sphere'.⁵⁵ This also 'translates into a margin of appreciation for that State as to how it balances the conflicting rights of the mother'.⁵⁶ However, it would be misleading to suggest that the Court is neutral or indifferent on the issue of abortion. While acknowledging the lack of a 'common approach regarding the beginning of life', the Court has acknowledged that 'there is indeed a consensus amongst a substantial majority of the Contracting States of the Council of Europe towards allowing abortion and that most Contracting Parties have in their legislation resolved the conflicting rights of the foetus and the mother in favour of greater access to abortion'.⁵⁷ Indeed, in abortion cases the mother's right to life may also be threatened to the extent that she may be denied appropriate access to measures in order to terminate a pregnancy. This was raised in an Irish case, but the Court considered that the right-to-life issue could not be sustained because it was possible for the woman to travel abroad and obtain an abortion.⁵⁸ The Court's approach with respect to article 2 has enabled it to deal with the issue of abortion within the context of the right of a pregnant woman to private life enshrined in article 8.⁵⁹ In a French case, the Grand Chamber gave two reasons for invoking the margin of appreciation. First, the issue of protecting the unborn child has not been resolved within the majority of Contracting States, in particular in France, and secondly, Europe lacks a 'consensus on the scientific and legal definition of the beginning of life'.⁶⁰ In an Irish case, the Court spoke of 'the impossibility of finding a uniform European conception of morals including on the question of when life begins'.⁶¹

Article 2 may apply even if there has not been loss of life, but where 'the circumstances of the case and the nature of inflicted injuries indicate that the applicant's life was in serious danger'.⁶² The reasoning seems to be that the text of article 2 covers not only intentional killing but also situations where force may result in unintended deprivation of life.⁶³ Where potentially lethal force is used, article 2 is engaged even if the victim does not die. This seems to open up the provision uncontrollably, but the Court has said that only in exceptional circumstances can physical ill-treatment by State agents not resulting in death disclose a violation of article 2.⁶⁴ According to the Court, 'the degree and type of force used and the intention or aim behind the use of force may, among other factors, be relevant in assessing whether in a particular case the State agents' actions in inflicting injury short of death are such as to bring the facts within the scope of the safeguard afforded by Article 2'.⁶⁵ Resort to force is deemed to be potentially lethal when public officials use firearms that are directed at an individual who is wounded, and the fact that they did not intend to kill the victim is irrelevant.⁶⁶

But article 2 has been applied in cases where the victim did not die even when the force was not attributable to State agents. For example, the Court held article 2 applicable when, following a traffic accident, an applicant was in a coma for several years, then became severely disabled and completely lost personal autonomy.⁶⁷ The Court also found there had been a violation of article 2 when a woman and her children were withdrawn from a witness protection programme, making them vulnerable to life-threatening reprisal attacks by organized crime.⁶⁸ Article 2 was engaged as a result of life-threatening injuries to minor children who entered premises housing an electronic transformer and who were electrocuted.⁶⁹ It also applied to a prisoner who contracted HIV/AIDS while in detention⁷⁰ and to a prisoner with AIDS who argued that denial of compassionate release had shortened his life,⁷¹ and where persons who had received blood transfusions were contaminated.⁷² However, where inadequate regulation of deep-sea diving created risks to health that were not life-threatening, the Court preferred to consider the matter under article 8 and not article 2.⁷³

A presumption of death may arise in the case of missing persons. The Court has said that such a presumption is 'not automatic and is only reached on examination of the circumstances of the case, in which the lapse of time since the person was seen alive or heard from is a relevant element'.⁷⁴ Generally, the presumption has applied when governments claim that a person is still alive or that there is insufficient evidence of official involvement in the disappearance.⁷⁵ The procedural obligation associated with article 2, discussed below, is of particular relevance in such cases. It will continue even when death is proven or presumed because the obligation 'to account for the disappearance and death, and to identify and prosecute any perpetrator of unlawful acts in that connection, will generally remain'.⁷⁶

'Protected by law': Positive obligations

The obligation of the State with respect to the right to life has both negative and positive dimensions. In a negative sense, the State must refrain from deprivation of life of the individual except in the case of the death penalty, as well as the other exceptions set out in paragraph 2 of article 2 and the exceptions that are implicit. The positive obligations result from the requirement that the right to life be 'protected by law'. But the manner in which article 2 has been interpreted indicates that the obligation is far more extensive. In effect, not only must the State 'protect by law' the right to life, it must also pursue policy measures aimed at its respect and fulfilment.

States must take 'appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within their jurisdiction'.⁷⁷ This involves a 'primary duty' to put in place an 'appropriate legal and administrative framework to deter the commission of offences against the person, backed up by law enforcement machinery for the prevention, suppression and punishment of breaches of such provisions'.⁷⁸ Several features of the positive obligation to protect the right to life have been considered in the case law of the Convention organs. They are discussed in some detail below. The list is not exhaustive and potentially covers any activity, whether public or not, where life is at stake.⁷⁹ For example, it could be extended deep into the realm of economic and social rights. However, the Court has stated that article 2 is 'unconcerned with issues to do with the quality of living or what a person chooses to do with his or her life. To the extent that these aspects are recognised as so fundamental to the human condition that they require protection from state interference, they may be reflected in the rights guaranteed by other articles of the Convention, or in other international Human Rights instruments.'⁸⁰ According to the Court, '[w]ithout in any way negating the principle of sanctity of life protected under the Convention, the Court considers that it is under Article 8 that notions of the quality of life take on significance'.

It is well established that a State may not extradite, deport, or otherwise expel someone to another State where there is a real risk of a violation of the right to life.⁸¹ Until recently, the Court had resisted affirming that the death penalty itself would constitute such a violation, given the reference to capital punishment in article 2(1) of the Convention. The position has now changed, a matter discussed later in this chapter.

Criminal justice

Much of article 2 of the Convention, but especially the second paragraph, deals with the protection against violent death, be it at the hands of State agents such as police and prison officials or private individuals. Criminal law provides the framework through the prohibition of various forms of homicide. The effective enforcement of such legal norms is at the heart of positive obligations of the State to ensure that article 2 is respected. According to the Court, 'the first sentence of Article 2 of the Convention requires States, in particular, to put in place a legislative and administrative framework designed to provide effective deterrence against threats to the right to life in the context of any activity, whether public or not, in which the right to life may be at stake'.⁸² An effective judicial system 'may, and under certain circumstances must, include recourse to the criminal law'.⁸³ The European Court will assess the scope of positive obligations with respect to law enforcement '[b]earing in mind the difficulties in policing modern societies, the unpredictability of human conduct and the operational choices which must be made in terms of priorities and resources'. The Convention does not impose 'an impossible or disproportionate burden on the authorities'. According to the Court:

For a positive obligation to arise, it must be established that the authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life of an identified individual from the criminal acts of a third party and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk. Another relevant consideration is the need to ensure that the police exercise their powers to control and prevent crime in a manner which fully respects the due process and other guarantees which legitimately place restraints on the scope of their action to investigate crime and bring offenders to justice, including the guarantees contained in Articles 5 and 8 of the Convention.⁸⁴

The Court has said that 'in the normal course of events, a criminal trial, with an adversarial procedure before an independent and impartial judge, must be regarded as furnishing the strongest safeguards of an effective procedure for the finding of facts and the attribution of criminal responsibility'.⁸⁵

Obviously, all States Parties prohibit homicide within their domestic criminal law. Exceptions, in the form of justifications and excuses, such as self-defence and duress, do not pose any particular problem here, although in principle they constitute exceptions to the prosecution of homicide. A criminal justice system may provide for various forms and modalities of homicide, such as involuntary homicide or manslaughter, without running afoul of article 2.⁸⁶ Indeed, it may extend to negligent forms of killing, such as medical malpractice.⁸⁷ But it would appear that the requirement that killing be dealt with by criminal law only applies to intentional homicide.⁸⁸ There is authority for the view that criminal law need not punish homicide that results from omission, a matter on which criminal justice policy varies considerably within Europe. For example, some European States prosecute the crime of failing to assist a person whose life is in danger, while others consider that there is no obligation in such circumstances. This is relevant to the euthanasia debate, where the case law of the Strasbourg organs is not clear.⁸⁹

Limitations on the prosecution of homicide may also result from other features of criminal law, such as pardon, amnesty, and statutory limitation. The Commission held that amnesty for killing was not inconsistent with article 2 'unless it can be seen to form part of a general practice aimed at the systematic presentation of prosecution of the perpetrators of such crimes'.⁹⁰ The position has evolved, however, reflecting a 'growing tendency in international law' associated with a 'unanimously recognised obligation of States to prosecute and punish grave breaches of fundamental human rights'.⁹¹ The Court has said that it 'considers that an amnesty is generally incompatible with the duty incumbent on the States to investigate'.⁹² Similar reasoning applies to statutory limitations, where the Court considers 'it is of the utmost importance that criminal proceedings and sentencing are not time-barred'.⁹³ Moreover, 'it is legitimate for a State governed by the rule of law to bring criminal proceedings against persons who have committed crimes under a former regime'.⁹⁴ At the same time, it has recognized the possible conflict between the duty to prosecute criminals and 'a country's determination to promote reconciliation in society',⁹⁵ refusing to rule out the possibility of a general amnesty 'where there are some particular circumstances, such as a reconciliation process and/or a form of compensation to the victim'.⁹⁶

In addition to prosecution, which necessarily arises after the violation of the right to life, the State also has a positive obligation to take 'preventive operational measures to protect an individual whose life is at risk from the criminal acts of another individual'.⁹⁷ It must be established that 'the authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life of an identified individual from the criminal acts of a third party and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk'.⁹⁸ In a case involving domestic violence, the Court considered that the fact the victim had complained that the perpetrator was invading her privacy and wandering around her property with guns and knives, that he had a shotgun and had made violent threats, and that the authorities refused to put the individual in detention was a violation of article 2.⁹⁹ The Court has made a distinction between cases that concern personal protection of individuals¹⁰⁰ and those involving the obligation to afford general protection to society.¹⁰¹

Use of firearms

Many issues concerning the use of firearms by State officials are addressed under the specific headings of article 2(2). The Court has examined the broader issue within the framework of article 2(1). Thus, the primary duty on the State to secure the right to life necessitates 'an appropriate legal and administrative framework defining the limited circumstances in which law enforcement officials may use force and firearms, in the light of the relevant international standards'.¹⁰² Any recourse to firearms must also be dependent 'on a careful assessment of the situation'.¹⁰³ National legislation regulating police operations 'must secure a system of adequate and effective safeguards against arbitrariness and abuse of force and even against avoidable accident'.¹⁰⁴

For example, a legal framework allowing police to fire upon a fugitive member of the armed forces who did not comply with a warning to surrender and firing of a warning shot was not consistent with article 2(1).¹⁰⁵ Similarly, antiquated legislation authorizing the police to use firearms without consequences in a broad range of circumstances was not deemed acceptable.¹⁰⁶ The Court did not object when regulations provided an exhaustive list of situations when firearms could be used, specifying that they were to be a last resort and to be preceded by warning shots, before shots were fired at the legs or indiscriminately.¹⁰⁷ Warning shots must be fired 'whenever possible'.¹⁰⁸

For guidance in this area, States should consider the United Nations Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials.¹⁰⁹ These principles were adopted by the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders. The Grand Chamber has referred to 'the primary duty on the State to secure the right to life by putting in place an appropriate legal and administrative framework defining the limited circumstances in which law enforcement officials may use force and firearms, in the light of the relevant international standards', referring specifically to paragraph 9 of the Basic Principles:

Law enforcement officials shall not use firearms against persons except in self-defence or defence of others against the imminent threat of death or serious injury, to prevent the perpetration of a particularly serious crime involving grave threat to life, to arrest a person presenting such a danger and resisting their authority, or to prevent his or her escape, and only when less extreme means are insufficient to achieve these objectives. In any event, intentional lethal use of firearms may only be made when strictly unavoidable in order to protect life.¹¹⁰

The Grand Chamber has also invoked paragraph 5, requiring law enforcement officials to 'act in proportion to the seriousness of the offence and the legitimate objective to be achieved', paragraph 7, stating that 'Governments shall ensure that arbitrary or abusive use of force and firearms by law enforcement officials is punished as a criminal offence under their law.' The Court has also drawn attention to provisions of the Basic Principles encouraging States to develop 'a range of means as broad as possible and equip law enforcement officials with various types of weapons and ammunition that would allow for a differentiated use of force and firearms. These should include the development of non-lethal incapacitating weapons for use in appropriate situations, with a view to increasingly restraining the application of means capable of causing death or injury to persons.' Furthermore, 'the development and deployment of non-lethal incapacitating weapons should be carefully evaluated in order to minimize the risk of endangering uninvolved persons, and the use of such weapons should be carefully controlled'. With reference to the Basic Principles, the Court has said that '[w]henver the lawful use of force and firearms is unavoidable, law-enforcement officials must, in particular, "ensure that assistance and medical aid are rendered to any injured or affected persons at the earliest possible moment", and ensure that arbitrary or abusive use of force and firearms by law-enforcement officials is punished as a criminal offence under their law'.¹¹¹ It has insisted that '[t]he Basic Principles also stipulate that "exceptional circumstances such as internal political instability or any other public emergency may not be invoked to justify any departure from these basic principles".¹¹² With respect to a duty to investigate, reference has been made to paragraph 23, requiring that victims or their family should have access to an independent process, 'including a judicial process', and paragraph 24: 'Governments and law enforcement agencies shall ensure that superior officers are held responsible if they know, or should have known, that law enforcement officials under their command are resorting, or have resorted, to the unlawful use of force and firearms, and they did not take all measures in their power to prevent, suppress or report such use.'¹¹³

Public health and safety

Positive obligations also apply in the sphere of public health and safety. The Court has recognized that 'acts and omissions of the authorities in the field of health care policy may in certain circumstances engage their responsibility under the positive limb of Article 2'.¹¹⁴ States are required 'to make regulations compelling hospitals, whether private or public, to adopt appropriate measures for the protection of patients' lives'.¹¹⁵ However, if a State has provided for high professional standards among health professionals, matters such as error of judgment or negligent co-ordination among health professionals in the treatment of a particular patient are not sufficient to engage the positive obligations under article 2 of the Convention to protect life.¹¹⁶

Where the State has undertaken to make health care available to the population in general, a violation of article 2 may arise if a person's life is put at risk when this is denied.¹¹⁷ The State may even be required to provide appropriate drugs for treatment of life-threatening illness.¹¹⁸ However, the Court has refused to extend the scope of article 2 so as to require that the State provide access to unauthorized medicinal products for the terminally ill.¹¹⁹

In the area of public safety where building sites¹²⁰ or dangerous industrial activities pose a threat to life they must be regulated by the State.¹²¹ The State must ensure safety on the roads¹²² and on board ships within its jurisdiction.¹²³ The right to life may be engaged where a school system does not ensure that young children may return home in dangerous weather conditions.¹²⁴ More generally, the State must regulate the protection of public safety in public spaces and ensure the regulatory framework functions effectively.¹²⁵ The State must also guarantee that emergency services are available.¹²⁶

A distinction is made when the State organizes or authorizes activities that are inherently dangerous, such as intense military training. In such cases, 'it must ensure through a system of rules and through sufficient control that the risk is reduced to a reasonable minimum. If nevertheless damage arises, it will only amount to a breach of the State's positive obligations if it was due to insufficient regulations or insufficient control, but not if the damage was caused through the negligent conduct of an individual or the concatenation of unfortunate events.'¹²⁷

Suicide and euthanasia

The positive obligation to protect the right to life extends to regulating risks to which individuals submit themselves voluntarily,¹²⁸ including self-harm.¹²⁹ Article 2 'obliges the national authorities to prevent an individual from taking his or her own life if the decision has not been taken freely and with full understanding of what is involved'.¹³⁰ In cases dealing with hunger strikes of prisoners, the Convention organs have declined to blame the State for a violation of article 2 provided that there has been no abuse in its management of the situation.¹³¹

The European Commission dismissed a case where the applicant claimed she would be induced to commit suicide if her husband was forced to serve a prison sentence.¹³² Similarly, it concluded there was no issue under article 2 of the Convention in a case where an internally displaced person confronted with eviction from a temporary residence took her own life. The Court said that 'reasonably speaking, self-immolation as a protest tactic does not constitute predictable or reasonable conduct in the context of eviction from an illegally occupied dwelling, even in a situation involving such a particularly vulnerable sector of the population as refugees and internally displaced persons'.¹³³

However, in a situation where an individual threatens to take his or her own life in plain view of State agents and, moreover, where this threat is an emotional reaction directly induced by the State agents' actions or demands, the latter should treat this threat with the utmost seriousness as constituting an imminent risk to that individual's life, regardless of how unexpected that threat might have been. In the Court's opinion, in such a situation as in the present case, if the State agents become aware of such a threat a sufficient time in advance, a positive obligation arises under Article 2 requiring them to prevent this threat from materialising, by any means which are reasonable and feasible in the circumstances.¹³⁴

Once they become aware of such a threat, State agents are required to take action, such as attempting to calm the situation and even physically preventing someone from taking his or her life. Other measures include provision of first aid and ensuring emergency medical services.

In an application directed against Switzerland, the Court warned about underestimating 'the risks of abuse inherent in a system that facilitates access to assisted suicide'.¹³⁵ It endorsed the view of the Federal Tribunal, itself interpreting article 2 of the Convention, whereby the right to life requires States 'to establish a procedure capable of ensuring that a decision to end one's life does indeed correspond to the free wish of the individual concerned'. The Court said that a medical prescription following a full psychiatric examination would fulfil this requirement.¹³⁶

Detainees

As a general rule, 'persons in custody are in a vulnerable position and . . . the authorities are under a duty to protect them'.¹³⁷ There is a positive obligation to protect a detainee if the authorities 'knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life of an identified individual by a third party or himself and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk'.¹³⁸ But even if it cannot be established that the authorities knew or should have known of such a risk, certain precautions must be taken by police officers and prison officials in order to protect the health and well-being of a person who has been detained.¹³⁹

The obligation to protect life with respect to persons who are detained implies the provision of medical care required to prevent fatality with an appropriate degree of due diligence.¹⁴⁰ When persons die in detention as a result of a health problem, 'the State must offer an explanation as to the cause of death and the treatment administered to the person concerned prior to his or her death'.¹⁴¹ The State may also be responsible for failing to provide adequate emergency medical care to detainees.¹⁴² Similar principles apply in the case of involuntary hospitalization¹⁴³ as well as to members of the armed forces, particularly when they are conscripts.¹⁴⁴

The procedural obligation

The case law of the European Court speaks of a 'procedural obligation' that is comprised within article 2.¹⁴⁵ At the core of the procedural obligation is the need to hold accountable those who are responsible for the deprivation of life. Thus, it is first and foremost a requirement of the criminal justice system of the State in question. But the procedural obligation also goes beyond criminal prosecution. Depending upon the circumstances and the nature of the violation it may require other forms of inquiry. The procedural obligation 'is not an obligation of result but of means only'.¹⁴⁶

The procedural obligation under article 2 has been held to be 'separate and autonomous' from the substantive obligation and is independent of the issue of a substantive breach of article 2.¹⁴⁷ Even if the State is not responsible for the death itself, it will still have an obligation to inquire into the circumstances, cause, and responsibility for the deprivation of life to the extent that it takes place 'under suspicious circumstances, leaving room for allegations to be made of the intentional taking of life'.¹⁴⁸ Applicants before the Court have made claims solely on the basis of the procedural obligation without reference to the substantive violation.¹⁴⁹ Moreover, it is possible for the Court to consider the procedural obligation even when it has no jurisdiction ratione temporis over the substantive issue.¹⁵⁰

When use of lethal force results in death, article 2 read in conjunction with article 1 requires that there be 'some form of effective official investigation'.¹⁵¹ The purpose is securing effective implementation of domestic legislation protecting the right to life and ensuring accountability for those responsible. Such an interpretation of article 2 is justified 'not only because any allegations of such an offence normally give rise to criminal liability, but also because often, in practice, the true circumstances of the death are, or may be, largely confined within the knowledge of State officials or authorities'.¹⁵² This investigation must be thorough¹⁵³ and independent,¹⁵⁴ accessible to the family of the victim,¹⁵⁵ carried out promptly,¹⁵⁶ capable of leading to a determination as to whether the use of force was justified, and allowing appropriate public scrutiny of the investigation or its results.¹⁵⁷ The inquiry must be 'effective', although that does not mean it will confirm the applicant's version of the events. But it should be capable of establishing the facts and leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible.¹⁵⁸ The form the investigation takes may vary depending upon the circumstances and cannot be codified in a simplified list.¹⁵⁹ The authorities must always make a serious attempt to find out what happened and should not rely on hasty or ill-founded conclusions to close their investigation or as the basis of their decisions. They must take all reasonable steps available to them to secure the evidence concerning the incident, including, inter alia, eyewitness testimony, forensic evidence, and so on.¹⁶⁰ The relatives of the victims must have access to the materials and conclusions of the investigation,¹⁶¹ although the requirement of an inquiry cannot be left to their initiative.¹⁶² The authorities must act with dispatch even if the next of kin of the victim does not.¹⁶³

In the case of a death in custody, article 2 requires an independent and impartial official investigation that satisfies certain minimum standards as to effectiveness. Accordingly, the competent authorities must act with exemplary diligence and promptness and must, of their own motion, initiate investigations capable of, firstly, ascertaining the circumstances in which the incident took place and any shortcomings in the operation of the regulatory system and, secondly, identifying the State officials or authorities involved.¹⁶⁴

Although recourse to criminal justice will often be necessary in order to fulfil the procedural obligation, it will not suffice in some situations where effective criminal investigation is fundamentally flawed or to all intents and purposes ineffective because of a systemic problem.¹⁶⁵ The aim of criminal prosecution should be to show that killing will not be tolerated. Where judges in a case involving negligent homicide by law enforcement officials made a finding of guilt but suspended the proceedings, thereby minimizing the significance of the killing, the European Court held that article 2 had been breached. It said that the criminal justice system 'proved to be far from rigorous and had little deterrent effect capable of ensuring the effective prevention of unlawful acts, such as those complained of by the applicants'.¹⁶⁶

Enforced disappearance is an important human rights violation that often results in a breach of the right to life, where it generally takes the form of an extra-judicial execution. In a particular form known as Nacht und Nebel, an expression that Hitler borrowed from Richard Wagner's opera Das Rheingold, persons characterized as terrorists or saboteurs were either executed immediately or secretly transferred to Germany without being allowed to communicate with family and friends.¹⁶⁷ More recently, enforced disappearance was defined as a specific act of crime against humanity in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.¹⁶⁸ It is described in the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance as 'the arrest, detention, abduction or any other form of deprivation of liberty committed by agents of the State or by persons or groups of persons acting with the authorisation, support or acquiescence of the State, followed by a refusal to acknowledge the deprivation of liberty or by concealment of the fate or whereabouts of the disappeared person, which place such a person outside the protection of the law'.¹⁶⁹ The Court has referred to this formulation as the international law definition of the phenomenon.¹⁷⁰ According to the Court, disappearance is 'characterised by an on-going situation of uncertainty and unaccountability in which there is a lack of information or even a deliberate concealment and obfuscation of what has occurred'.¹⁷¹

Before the European Court enforced disappearance cases have been dealt with under the procedural obligation comprised within article 2 to the extent that the right to life is at stake. The State authorities are required to act rapidly and decisively in responding to the disappearance precisely in order to reduce the risk to the life of the missing person.¹⁷² Disappearance is often protracted, 'prolonging the torment of the victim's relatives', raising issues under article 3 as well as article 2 of the Convention. It is a continuing violation that persists as long as the fate of the person is not accounted for, even when death is presumed.¹⁷³ An onus is placed upon the next of kin by the Court in disappearance cases. They 'cannot wait indefinitely before coming to Strasbourg' and 'must make proof of a certain amount of diligence and initiative and introduce their complaints without undue delay'.¹⁷⁴

Where killing is intentional, a civil action for redress cannot, in the absence of other remedies, be considered adequate.¹⁷⁵ The European Court considers that a civil court is unable to pursue an independent investigation or to make meaningful findings about the identity of perpetrators or the attribution of responsibility without the benefit of a criminal investigation.¹⁷⁶ However, if killing is not intentional a criminal law remedy is not necessarily required.¹⁷⁷ For example, in the case of motor vehicle accidents 'caused by pure negligence without aggravating circumstances, the Court may be satisfied if the legal system affords victims a remedy in the civil courts enabling any liability of the parties concerned to be established and any appropriate civil redress, such as an order for damages, to be obtained'.¹⁷⁸ This does not rule out criminal prosecution, which may be based upon a theory of negligence, but it means that the 'the procedural obligation imposed by Article 2 to set up an effective judicial system does not necessarily require the provision of a criminal-law remedy in every case'.¹⁷⁹

A common problem with respect to non-intentional killing is raised in medical negligence cases. There must be an 'effective judicial system for establishing both the cause of death of an individual under the care and responsibility of health professionals and any responsibility on the part of the latter'.¹⁸⁰ This applies, for example, in the case of determining the cause of death of patients in the care of the medical profession.¹⁸¹ The inquiry must be undertaken with celerity, if for no other reason than that '[k]nowledge of the facts and of possible errors committed in the course of medical care are essential to enable the institutions concerned and medical staff to remedy the potential deficiencies and prevent similar errors. The prompt examination of such cases is therefore important for the safety of users of all health services.'¹⁸²

One dimension of the procedural obligation is the right of victims, their families, and heirs to know the truth about circumstances associated with a violation of the right to life, especially when this is related to a large-scale or massive violation of fundamental rights.¹⁸³ The Court has stressed the importance of this 'in the event of widespread use of lethal force against the civilian population during anti-Government demonstrations preceding the transition from a totalitarian regime to a more democratic system'.¹⁸⁴ Although the issue arises in the context of individual rights, there is some authority for the significance of a broader collective or social dimension to this right to know the truth. In one decision, the Court framed the importance of an investigation into events in light not only of the rights of the individual applicants but 'in view also of the importance to Romanian society of knowing the truth about the events of December 1989'.¹⁸⁵ In El Masri, where 'extraordinary renditions' were involved, the Grand Chamber underscored 'the great importance of the present case not only for the applicant and his family, but also for other victims of similar crimes and the general public, who had the right to know what had happened'.¹⁸⁶ In a concurring opinion in that case, several judges noted that the right to truth was implied within the Convention, in particular within the procedural obligation of articles 2 and 3, although they argued that it was best approached from the perspective of article 13. They wrote:

In practice, the search for the truth is the objective purpose of the obligation to carry out an investigation and the raison d'être of the related quality requirements (transparency, diligence, independence, access, disclosure of results and scrutiny). For society in general, the desire to ascertain the truth plays a part in strengthening confidence in public institutions and hence the rule of law. For those concerned—the victims' families and close friends—establishing the true facts and securing an acknowledgment of serious breaches of human rights and humanitarian law constitute forms of redress that are just as important as compensation, and sometimes even more so. Ultimately, the wall of silence and the cloak of secrecy prevent these people from making any sense of what they have experienced and are the greatest obstacles to their recovery.¹⁸⁷

Another decision, referring to the killings by soldiers during the conflict in Northern Ireland, insisted upon the importance of a 'reasoned decision available to reassure a concerned public that the rule of law had been respected'.¹⁸⁸ In other words, the procedural obligation may be informed by a right to know the historical truth.

In the case dealing with the procedural obligation to disclose about the Katyn massacre that took place in the Soviet Union in 1940, it was argued that one factor justifying extension of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court, on an exceptional basis, was the importance of truth seeking in order to enable nations to learn from their history and to take measures to prevent future atrocities.¹⁸⁹ Reliance was placed upon the Updated Set of Principles for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights Through Action to Combat Impunity issued by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in 2005,¹⁹⁰ the International Committee of the Red Cross rules of customary international law¹⁹¹ and the case law of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.¹⁹² However, the Grand Chamber distinguished the procedural obligation of individual victims comprised in article 2 from 'other types of inquiries that may be carried out for other purposes, such as establishing a historical truth'.¹⁹³ Four dissenting judges said that in addition to the rights of the individual victims, 'it is equally clear that the obligation to investigate and prosecute those responsible for grave human rights and serious humanitarian law violations serves fundamental public interests by allowing a nation to learn from its history and by combating impunity'.¹⁹⁴

'Intentionally'

The drafting history of the Convention suggests that article 2 was only meant to cover intentional killing.¹⁹⁵ In proceedings before the European Commission, the United Kingdom took the position that negligent or accidental killing was not contemplated by article 2.¹⁹⁶ The Commission adopted the view that the first sentence of article 2(1) was broader than the second, in that it required States not only to refrain from intentional deprivation of life but also to take steps to safeguard life.¹⁹⁷ The issue is no longer in serious dispute.

The death penalty

The death penalty is presented as an exception to the right to life in article 2(1) of the Convention. Capital punishment was certainly consistent with the practice of European States at the time the Convention was adopted. Some had long abandoned the death penalty, only to bring it back for post-Second-World-War prosecutions of Nazis and their collaborators. Very soon after the Convention entered into force, a strong trend towards abolition began to emerge. In 1953, a United Kingdom Royal Commission on capital punishment declined to recommend abolition,¹⁹⁸ although only a few more executions actually took place before the practice was abandoned. Brian Simpson has explained that executions conducted in Cyprus by the United Kingdom in 1956 were 'the trigger' that led Greece to file the first inter-State case at the Commission.¹⁹⁹ The application by Greece was lodged on 7 May 1956, the date when clemency was refused to two Cypriot independence fighters, Michael Karaolis and Andreas Demetriou. However, the reports of the Commission do not indicate that Greece ever raised the issue of capital punishment or questioned the United Kingdom's compliance with article 2 of the Convention.²⁰⁰ Ireland's last execution took place in 1954. But France continued to execute people until the late 1970s and only removed the death penalty from its laws in 1981. In Belgium, death sentences were still being pronounced in the early 1990s, although no executions have taken place there since 1950. Latvia hosted the last execution in a Council of Europe Member State, in 1997. Today, the death penalty no longer exists within the territory of the Council of Europe. The reference to capital punishment in article 2(1) of the Convention is, for all practical purposes, repealed. Protocol Nos 6 and 13 to the Convention entrench the abolitionist commitment of the Council of Europe. The case law of the Strasbourg organs concerning article 2 and the death penalty is almost entirely confined to extraterritorial imposition of capital punishment, essentially extradition and expulsion cases.

The counterparts of article 2(1) in subsequent human rights treaties, notably article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and article 4 of the American Convention on Human Rights, impose several restrictions on the exercise of capital punishment, including the requirement that it only be imposed for the 'most serious crimes' and that it not be imposed on juvenile offenders or pregnant women. In a comparative study of the European Convention and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, a Committee of Experts on Human Rights appointed by the Council of Europe implied that article 2 of the Convention provides essentially the same protections in death penalty cases as article 6 of the Covenant, but this is obviously not the case.²⁰¹

Comparing the two instruments, a senior lawyer in the Council of Europe described the death penalty provisions in article 6 of the Covenant as 'distinctly more progressive' than those in article 2 of the Convention.²⁰² In 1979, when the issue of amending article 2 of the Convention arose so as to bring it into step with the more advanced norms of the American Convention on Human Rights, the Steering Committee on Human Rights of the Council of Europe was concerned that such an amendment might imply acceptance of the death penalty at a time when there was a general trend towards abolition.²⁰³

Two explicit limitations to the death penalty appear in article 2: the sentence must be pronounced by a 'court' and it must be 'provided for by law'. The word 'court' appears elsewhere in the Convention, in article 5(1)(a), 5(1)(b), 5(4). It has been interpreted as implying a body independent of the executive branch of government and offering the guarantees of a judicial procedure.²⁰⁴ In Öcalan, the Court said that it 'follows from the requirement in Article 2 § 1 that the deprivation of life be pursuant to the "execution of a sentence of a court", that the "court" which imposes the penalty be an independent and impartial tribunal within the meaning of the Court's case-law and that the most rigorous standards of fairness are observed in the criminal proceedings both at first instance and on appeal'.²⁰⁵ The term 'provided by law' imposes an obligation on any State that wishes to impose the death penalty to ensure that this is in fact authorized by law that is both foreseeable and accessible.²⁰⁶

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the American Convention on Human Rights, both adopted during the 1960s, reflect evolving international standards in the area. They include several limitations upon resort to capital punishment that do not appear in the text of article 2(1) of the European Convention. In particular, the death penalty can only be imposed for the 'most serious crimes', the relevant fair trial provisions must be honoured, and certain categories of individuals—namely pregnant women, juveniles, and the elderly—cannot be executed. Whether these might be implicit limitations to article 2(1) has never really been tested by the Convention organs. In Soering v. the United Kingdom, the Court noted that article 2(1) permitted the death penalty 'under certain conditions'.²⁰⁷ When the case was examined by the European Commission, several members penned dissenting opinions in which they indicated that there were indeed such limitations. Jochen Frowein said that article 2 only authorized the death penalty for the 'most serious crimes', echoing the rule contained in the Covenant and the American Convention.²⁰⁸ Three other members of the Commission agreed that although the death penalty was expressly permitted by article 2 and could not therefore 'in general' be regarded as in conflict with article 3, this did not exclude 'special circumstances justifying a different conclusion. Such circumstances may relate to the nature of the crime (e.g. a trivial offence under the laws of the Convention States) or the personal circumstances of the offender (e.g. his young age or his poor state of health) or indeed to the manner of execution'.²⁰⁹

The Soering case

Death penalty issues have generally involved consideration of article 3 as well as article 2(1) of the Convention. In an early case, the European Commission held 'that notwithstanding the terms of article 2§1, it cannot be excluded that the circumstances surrounding the protection of one of the other rights contained in the Convention might give rise to an issue under article 3'.²¹⁰ The case concerned the 'death row phenomenon' in California, a subject that returned some years later in one of the most emblematic cases, Soering v. the United Kingdom. Threatened with extradition from the United Kingdom to the United States, where there was the possibility of imposition of capital punishment, Soering contended that prolonged incarceration prior to execution and conditions of detention on death row would breach article 3 of the Convention. By six votes to five, the European Commission of Human Rights rejected the application. The Commission noted that article 2 'expressly permits the imposition of the death penalty' and that as a result 'extradition of a person to a country where he risks the death penalty cannot, in itself, raise an issue either under Article 2 or Article 3 of the Convention'.²¹¹ The Commission conceded that 'notwithstanding the terms of Article 2 para. 1, it cannot be excluded that the circumstances surrounding the protection of one of the other rights contained in the Convention might give rise to an issue under Article 3'.²¹² One of the dissenting members, Stefan Trechsel, wrote:

It may seem surprising that the Convention prohibits inhuman and degrading treatment but permits capital punishment which could be regarded as a clear example of such treatment. This paradox is to be explained by the historic context of the drafting of the Convention. Today, however, Article 2 para. 1, inasmuch as it accepts capital punishment, must be regarded as reflecting an attitude to the death penalty which has since undergone substantial change and is now outdated... its growing rejection leads one to conclude that aggravating circumstances, i.e. suffering beyond that necessarily inherent in execution, injustice or an element of disproportionality brings capital punishment into the realm of inhuman treatment prohibited by Article 3.²¹³

In this initial discussion of capital punishment by the Commission, the dissenting members considered that to the extent that the implied limitations of article 2(1) were not complied with, there was a violation of article 3. This linkage between articles 2 and 3 when the death penalty is concerned persists throughout the subsequent case law.

The European Court's landmark ruling held that the planned extradition of Soering to the United States was a violation of article 3 because of the prolonged detention that was likely prior to execution, coupled with the harsh conditions of detention and the young age of the applicant. The Court noted that in light of the wording of article 2(1), neither Soering nor the two Government parties²¹⁴ had taken the position that the death penalty per se violated article 3 of the Convention. However, the intervener Amnesty International argued that evolving standards of interpretation of the Convention meant that the death penalty should now be considered to breach article 3. The Court observed, in this respect, that '[d]e facto the death penalty no longer exists in time of peace in the contracting States of the Convention. In the few Contracting States which retain the death penalty in law for some peacetime offenses, death sentences, if ever imposed, are nowadays not carried out.'²¹⁵ The Court rejected the argument that the interpretation of the Convention could be extended in this way, so that article 3, in effect, rendered inoperative a portion of article 2(1). According to the Court, article 3 'cannot have been intended by the drafters of the Convention to include a general prohibition of the death penalty since that would nullify the clear wording of Article 2§1'.²¹⁶ The Court acknowledged that subsequent practice could support the argument that the reference to the death penalty was no longer operative. Nevertheless, the adoption of Protocol No. 6 to the Convention in 1983 'as a subsequent written agreement, shows that the intention of the Contracting Parties as recently as 1983 was to adopt the normal method of amendment of the text in order to introduce a new obligation to abolish capital punishment in time of peace and, what is more, to do so by an optional instrument allowing each State to choose the moment when to undertake such an engagement'.²¹⁷

The suggestion that the Convention's recognition of the death penalty as an exception to the right to life is now obsolete and incompatible with the legal conscience and practice of contemporary Europe was advanced by a single judge of the Court, Judge De Meyer, in a concurring opinion. Judge De Meyer said extradition of Soering would breach article 2 of the Convention. Because article 2(1) permits imposition of the death penalty only where this 'is provided by law' and because the death penalty was not 'provided by law' in the United Kingdom, the fact that it is allowed in Virginia is irrelevant, he wrote. 'When a person's right to life is involved, no requested State can be entitled to allow a requesting State to do what the requested State is not itself allowed to do.'²¹⁸

Towards abolition as such

The issue of capital punishment returned to the Court a decade later in Öcalan v. Turkey. Although Öcalan was sentenced to death, Turkey had abolished capital punishment and, by the time the case was heard in Strasbourg, commuted the sentence to one of life imprisonment.²¹⁹ The Chamber agreed that there was no threat that capital punishment would actually be imposed,²²⁰ but nevertheless considered the matter because a death sentence had been pronounced against the applicant. The Court elected to consider the matter from the standpoint of article 3 'against the background of Article 2'. It reviewed the position taken by the Court in Soering, but said 'the legal position as regards the death penalty has undergone a considerable evolution' since then.²²¹ The Chamber took note of a recent pronouncement of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe:

The second sentence of Article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights still provides for the death penalty. It has long been in the interest of the Assembly to delete this sentence, thus matching theory with reality. This interest is strengthened by the fact that more modern national constitutional documents and international treaties no longer include such provisions.²²²

The Chamber said that 'it cannot now be excluded, in the light of the developments that have taken place in this area, that the States have agreed through their practice to modify the second sentence in Article 2 § 1 in so far as it permits capital punishment in peacetime'.²²³ Moreover, 'it can also be argued that the implementation of the death penalty can be regarded as inhuman and degrading treatment contrary to Article 3'.²²⁴ But the Chamber said it was not necessary to reach 'any firm conclusion' because in any event the conviction had been the result of an unfair trial and could be addressed by article 6. The Grand Chamber essentially endorsed the conclusions of the Chamber. It put more emphasis on the role of Protocol No. 13, returning to the view expressed by the Plenary Court in Soering by which the States Parties have elected to follow 'the traditional method of amendment of the text of the Convention'.²²⁵ Judge Garlicki wrote an individual opinion contesting the majority's 'replication of the Soering approach' and disputing whether the 'doctrine of pre-emption' meant the Court was prevented from stating the 'obvious truth' that the death penalty had been abolished within Europe.²²⁶

In Al Saadoon and Mufdhi v. The United Kingdom, involving the transfer of two prisoners to the Iraqi authorities by British occupying forces, the Court revisited the issue. The Chamber noted that there had been an evolution in the position since Öcalan, with further ratifications of Protocol No. 13. This, together with consistent State practice in observing the moratorium on capital punishment, was 'strongly indicative that Article 2 has been amended so as to prohibit the death penalty in all circumstances'.²²⁷ The Chamber said that '[a]gainst this background, the Court does not consider that the wording of the second sentence of Article 2 § 1 continues to act as a bar to its interpreting the words "inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" in Article 3 as including the death penalty'.²²⁸ Having concluded that the reference to capital punishment had in effect been deleted from the second sentence of article 2(1), the Court concluded that the applicants had suffered a violation of article 3. The Court said that the applicants had been 'subjected to a well-founded fear of execution' that caused them 'intense psychological suffering',²²⁹ and that this constituted inhuman treatment.²³⁰

The most advanced statement on the subject is found in one of the cases dealing with CIA detention centres in Poland. In Al Nashiri v. Poland, the Court said the fact that 'imposition and use of the death penalty negates fundamental human rights has been recognised by the member States of the Council of Europe'. It described judicial executions as 'the deliberate and premeditated destruction of a human being by the State authorities', adding that the extinction of human life involves physical pain regardless of the method of execution. Furthermore, 'the foreknowledge of death at the hands of the State must inevitably give rise to intense psychological suffering'.²³¹

Throughout its jurisprudence, from Soering to Al Nashiri, the Court has focused its consideration of capital punishment not on imposition of the penalty itself but on the psychological suffering imposed upon persons sentenced to death. Its approach contrasts with that taken by the Human Rights Committee. Because the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is universal and not regional in scope, the Committee cannot conclude that there is a consensus on abolition on a global scale comparable to what obtains within the Council of Europe. Instead, it had parsed the words of article 6(2) of the Covenant so that States Parties cannot invoke them where the death penalty has already been abolished.²³² The result is similar to that of the European Court, in that the reference to the death penalty in the right-to-life provision is deemed to be inoperative. However, the Human Rights Committee remains within the frame of the right to life rather than following the European Court and shifting the discussion to the issue of inhuman treatment.

Refoulement

Before the European Court of Human Rights, the issue of capital punishment now only arises with respect to the threat of transfer of an individual from a European State to one of the declining number of countries in the world where capital punishment still exists. In Al Nashiri v. Poland, of 24 July 2014, the European Court confirmed that 'Article 2 of the Convention prohibits the extradition or deportation of an individual to another State where substantial grounds have been shown for believing that he or she would face a real risk of being subjected to the death penalty there'.²³³ In most death penalty cases before the Convention organs, diplomatic assurances that capital punishment would not take place or an assessment of the likelihood that it would be imposed²³⁴ have been important issues. In Soering, although the United Kingdom was entitled to request diplomatic assurances under the extradition treaty,²³⁵ its decision not to seek them provoked the litigation. After the Court's decision, the United States promptly provided diplomatic assurances that were deemed acceptable by the Committee of Ministers.²³⁶ In several subsequent cases, applicants have contested the sufficiency of diplomatic assurances.²³⁷ A recent Albanian case provides an example of the nature of such assurances, in the form of a diplomatic note from the government of the United States: '... the Government of the United States hereby assures the Government of Albania that should Mr Rrapo be extradited to stand trial on the charges for which his extradition has been granted, the death penalty will not be sought or imposed against Almir Rrapo upon his extradition to the United States'.²³⁸ The Court harshly criticized the lower courts in Albania for their apparent willingness to allow Rrapo's extradition without assurances that the death penalty would be imposed in the United States.²³⁹ Eventually, however, the assurances were obtained. The Court said there was nothing to cast doubt on their validity, adding that there were no reported examples of the United States failing to respect similar assurances. The long-term interest of the United States in honouring its extradition commitments 'alone would be sufficient to give rise to a presumption of good faith against any risk of a breach of those assurances', it said.²⁴⁰ Similarly, in a case involving extradition to the Russian Federation, a Chamber considered assurances from the authorities that the death penalty would not be imposed to be acceptable. It referred to several factors that enhanced the credibility of the assurances, including a judgment of the Constitutional Court declaring the death penalty unconstitutional and the fact of Russia's membership in the Council of Europe.²⁴¹

The death penalty issue may also arise in expulsion cases, where there is no extradition request and where the question of diplomatic assurances on capital punishment under the relevant treaty does not therefore arise. An applicant must demonstrate a real risk that such refoulement will result in criminal prosecution and the prospect that capital punishment be imposed if guilt is established.²⁴² For example, the European Court has concluded that there is no real risk of execution in Kazakhstan, given the country's moratorium on the death penalty and systematic commutation of death sentences despite the fact that capital punishment still exists within the legal framework of the country.²⁴³

Paragraph 2 of article 2 authorizes the use of lethal force under three circumstances: defence of any person from unlawful violence; effecting a lawful arrest or preventing the escape of a person lawfully detained; or action to quell a riot or insurrection. The exceptions listed in article 2(2) appear to be exhaustive. The possibility that there exist non-enumerated exceptions cannot, however, be excluded. In one case, where the Court considered a military attack on civilians in a conflict zone, it said it would leave unresolved 'whether a State could be justified under Article 2 § 2 of the Convention in using lethal force against civilians for mere failure to comply with official safety instructions in an area of an armed conflict'.²⁴⁴ The application of article 2 in armed conflict is discussed below under the heading 'Armed conflict'.

Of the three listed exceptions to the right to life in article 2, paragraphs b and c seem largely confined to a law enforcement context, whereas paragraph a confirms the justifiable taking of life in defence of any person. The introductory paragraph or chapeau indicates that the exceptions are only permitted when they result 'from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary'. The words 'absolutely necessary' dictate that 'a stricter and more compelling test of necessity must be employed than that normally applicable when determining whether State action is "necessary in a democratic society" under paragraphs 2 of Articles 8 to 11 of the Convention'.²⁴⁵ Use of force must be 'strictly proportionate to the achievement of the aims set out in sub-paragraphs 2 (a), (b) and (c) of Article 2'.²⁴⁶ In addition, any deprivations of life must be subjected 'to the most careful scrutiny', bearing in mind 'all the surrounding circumstances, including such matters as the planning and control of the actions under examination'.²⁴⁷ Law enforcement operations must be 'planned and controlled so as to minimise to the greatest extent possible recourse to lethal force or incidental loss of life'.²⁴⁸

Article 2 authorizes the use of potentially lethal force in law enforcement, but it does not grant the authorities carte blanche. Their action must not be 'unregulated and arbitrary'. Not only must it be authorized under national law, it must also be sufficiently regulated with a system of 'adequate and effective safeguards against arbitrariness and abuse of force'.²⁴⁹ The Court has noted the difficulty in separating a State's negative obligations from its positive obligations when lethal force is employed in policing.²⁵⁰ The use of force may be justifiable when based upon a mistaken but 'honest belief which is perceived, for good reasons, to be valid at the time'.²⁵¹ Anything more demanding would impose an unrealistic burden on the State and on law enforcement authorities.²⁵²

Because the use of lethal force is only authorized in order to pursue one of the purposes listed in the three sub-paragraphs of article 2(2), there will inevitably be disputes about whether this was the genuine intent of the authorities. In Finogenov et al., which concerned a huge hostage taking in a Moscow theatre by Chechen militants, the applicants, who were the innocent hostages, contended that the authorities were unconcerned with their welfare and were principally concerned with eliminating those responsible for the crisis. In that case, the Court said there was insufficient evidence of bad faith, and that it would presume that the authorities were pursuing all three of the legitimate aims listed in article 2(2), adding that defence of any person from unlawful violence was predominant.²⁵³ It wrote:

In sum, the situation appeared very alarming. Heavily armed separatists dedicated to their cause had taken hostages and put forward unrealistic demands. The first days of negotiations did not bring any visible success; in addition, the humanitarian situation (the hostages' physical and psychological condition) had been worsening and made the hostages even more vulnerable. The Court concludes that there existed a real, serious and immediate risk of mass human losses and that the authorities had every reason to believe that a forced intervention was the 'lesser evil' in the circumstances. Therefore, the authorities' decision to end the negotiations and storm the building did not in the circumstances run counter to Article 2 of the Convention.²⁵⁴

One of the important proportionality issues concerns the means of lethal force. Usually, this will involve some form of firearm, although the Strasbourg organs have considered cases involving the use of rubber bullets,²⁵⁵ gas,²⁵⁶ fragmentation bombs,²⁵⁷ and even pepper spray.²⁵⁸ The Court has held that article 2 of the Convention also imposes a positive duty on the State to locate and deactivate mines, to mark and seal off mined areas so as to prevent anyone from freely entering them, and to provide comprehensive warnings concerning mines laid in the vicinity of non-combatants.²⁵⁹ According to the Court, 'the massive use of indiscriminate weapons . . . cannot be considered compatible with the standard of care prerequisite to an operation involving use of lethal force by State agents'.²⁶⁰ The Court has noted approvingly a judgment of the German Constitutional Court finding that a law authorizing the use of force to shoot down a hijacked aircraft believed intended for a terrorist attack was incompatible with protection of the right to life.²⁶¹

Defence from unlawful violence (art. 2(2)(a))

The words 'defence from unlawful violence' evoke the defence of self-defence in criminal law. It is defined with slight variations in the national criminal legislation of European States. Generally, legal systems consider the use of reasonable force by an individual to protect himself or herself, others for whom he or she is responsible, and his or her property. Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention is much narrower than the general rule because it deals only with lethal force, where the test of reasonableness will be stringent. Lethal force in self-defence will only be justified if a serious threat of death or serious injury is perceived. This conclusion results from the terms 'absolutely necessary' in the introductory words of article 2(2).

Although paragraph 2(2) is generally considered to deal with unintended killing, there may be cases when self-defence from life-threatening violence involves deliberate taking of human life, or certainly a degree of recklessness as to whether death will result. In a case involving police attempts to subdue an armed man who aimed a firearm at one of them and was then shot by a marksman, the Court said that 'the use of lethal force in the circumstances of this case, albeit highly regrettable, was not disproportionate and did not exceed what was absolutely necessary to avert what was honestly perceived by Officer B to be a real and immediate risk to his life and the lives of his colleagues'.²⁶² In another case involving a hostage taking, the Court disagreed with the European Commission, concluding that when two armed police used lethal force they had an honest belief that it was necessary to kill the victim in order to save the lives of both the hostage and of themselves.²⁶³ But when an isolated protester was set upon by a hostile mob with sticks and other weapons, the Court said that at the moment of the attack he 'seemed unarmed and was not attacking anyone. In any event, once he was lying on the ground, he was not posing a danger to others'.²⁶⁴

In Isayeva, Yusupova et al., Russia invoked article 2(2)(a) with respect to conduct of its armed forces, claiming they were acting in self-defence: 'the use of air power was justified by the heavy fire opened by members of illegal armed formations, which constituted a threat not only to the pilots, but also to the civilians who were in the vicinity. The pilots had to act in order to stop these illegal actions'.²⁶⁵ The Court did not explore the interpretation of article 2(2)(a), assuming that it was applicable but subject to a test of proportionality that Russia failed. It said: 'The Court is also prepared to accept that if the planes were attacked by illegal armed groups, that could have justified use of lethal force, thus falling within paragraph 2 of Article 2'.²⁶⁶ It referred to the 'attack' on Russian forces but the account, which is confused and about which the Court had serious doubts as to the credibility, is more like a rather classic military engagement than an exercise of self-defence. Russia seemed to adopt a very broad view, by which self-defence covers any action to protect society from violence. This seems an extravagant interpretation. Surely Russia was entitled to use force to deal with the Chechen uprising, but the applicable provision is article 2(2)(c) rather than 2(2)(a).

In a Turkish case, where three suspected terrorists were killed by police in an Istanbul café, the Court noted that the use of force 'was the direct result of the unlawful violence emanating from the deceased suspects'. The police had told civilians to leave the café and gave 'the necessary warnings' before going upstairs. The victims fired the first shot. The Court considered 'that when the police officers entered the café and were confronted with the shootings coming from the suspects, they believed that it was necessary to continue firing until the suspects stopped firing back'.²⁶⁷ The Court said that the killings could be considered to have occurred 'in defence of any person from unlawful violence' and 'in order to effect a lawful arrest'.²⁶⁸ It considered it unnecessary 'to speculate on the question of the possibility to use non-lethal methods by the security forces in order to arrest the deceased'.²⁶⁹ This was, therefore, a situation of an attempt to arrest and not a case of defence from unlawful violence. The Court should not have confused the two.

Rejecting the justification of defence from unlawful violence in a case where a Cypriot demonstrator was shot to death when he crossed into Turkish-occupied Cyprus and climbed a flagpole, the Court noted that the victim 'was unarmed and had not attacked anyone; he was climbing a pole and smoking a cigarette, two actions which were not compatible with violent action against other individuals'.²⁷⁰ Similarly, when an unarmed Greek Cypriot soldier was shot dead after breaching the ceasefire line and entering the buffer zone in order to fraternize with Turkish soldiers, the Court held that the victim's behaviour did not pose a threat sufficient to justify the use of lethal force.²⁷¹

In a case where police were trying to apprehend an individual who then drew a pistol in a threatening manner, the Court felt that the terms of article 2(2) were fulfilled and rejected the application.²⁷² When making an arrest, the police opened fire possibly in response to a door bolt being drawn back, thinking that they were about to come under fire. The Court said that firing fifty to fifty-five shots at the door, resulting in the death of the suspect who was behind the door, was not justified by any reasonable belief of the officers that their lives were at risk from the occupants of the flat.²⁷³ Moreover, 'opening fire with automatic weapons on an unseen target in a residential block inhabited by innocent civilians, women and children was as the Commission found, grossly disproportionate'.²⁷⁴ But when a suspect took the first shot at two police officers who were attempting to arrest her, the Court accepted that they had acted in self-defence and were therefore justified under article 2(2)(a).²⁷⁵ The Court 'cannot substitute its own assessment of the situation for that of an officer who was required to react in the heat of the moment to avert an honestly perceived danger to his life'.²⁷⁶

Lawful arrest or prevention of escape (art. 2(2)(b))

The wording of subparagraph (b) of article 2(2) might suggest that lethal force may be used even when there is no danger posed by the victim, in contrast with subparagraph (a) where, at least implicitly, the concept of self-defence implies that there is a serious threat justifying the use of lethal force. But the Court does not tolerate the use of lethal force where the victim does not pose a threat. In the leading case, Nachova v. Bulgaria, the Grand Chamber said that the legitimate aim of carrying out a lawful arrest could only justify a risk of death in circumstances of absolute necessity. It said that 'in principle there can be no such necessity where it is known that the person to be arrested poses no threat to life or limb and is not suspected of having committed a violent offence, even if a failure to use lethal force may result in the opportunity to arrest the fugitive being lost'.²⁷⁷ When firearms are to be used by law enforcement authorities, warning shots should be fired first.²⁷⁸

In some states, the relevant regulatory framework allows the use of lethal force when effecting an arrest regardless of the offence, a situation the Court has condemned as 'deficient'.²⁷⁹ Law enforcement authorities must not 'be left in a vacuum' about the extent to which they may use lethal force, in particular with firearms.²⁸⁰ Policing operations require proper regulation and adequate and effective safeguards against arbitrariness and abuse of force, including unavoidable accident.²⁸¹ Turkish legislation authorizing the use of lethal force within security zones, in particular border regions, where the victim does not obey an order to stop, without any requirement of proportionality in the use of firearms, has been deemed not to provide the requisite degree of protection of the right to life.²⁸² At the same time, it must be recognized that police must often react quickly, and without prior preparation, to difficult situations.²⁸³

The suggestion in judgments that the use of lethal force could be justified where the victim is suspected of having committed a 'violent offence' seems excessive, although the Court has not actually adjudicated a matter on this point. Even persons suspected of perpetrating violence offences will often pose no serious threat. The distinction between violent and non-violent offences only confuses matters. A person fleeing arrest for a serious non-violent offence may well be dangerous. The test should be whether there is an immediate threat of grave violence justifying lethal force.

In practice, in modern societies even a person fleeing arrest or escaping from detention is unlikely to get very far. Where a Cypriot demonstrator in Turkish-occupied Cyprus was shot to death after climbing a flagpole, the Court dismissed the defence of lawful arrest or prevention of escape, observing that 'it is obvious that he could hardly have escaped from the control of the security forces and that the authorities could have awaited his descent from the flagpole before arresting him'.²⁸⁴ But even had it been possible for him to escape, could it be acceptable to kill a demonstrator under such circumstances?

The Court has dealt with many cases in which the authorities attempted to apprehend individuals who were armed and dangerous.²⁸⁵ Obviously, a perceived immediate threat to innocent lives lends urgency to the use of force.²⁸⁶ Nevertheless, the use of lethal force must not only be necessary under the circumstances but it must also be used in such a way as to minimize the risk of death. This will be examined by considering the behaviour of the law-enforcement officials in the circumstances of the use of force, but also the planning and control of the operation. In a Bulgarian case, an armed criminal had fled into a residential building from which he had no means of escape. The Court said it was 'struck by the fact that the police do not appear to have had, or to have attempted to employ, any strategy aimed at minimising to the greatest extent possible recourse to lethal force'. There was no evidence of urgency or danger warranting recourse to armed force in order to effect the arrest. The Court said it was not convinced: that it was impossible for the police, for example, to attempt to warn Mr Vachkov of their intentions, or negotiate with him to put down his weapon, if he was armed, and surrender, or otherwise prevent recourse to lethal force, including a suicide attempt by him. Instead, apparently without considering any other possible course of action, the SATS officers entered into the building and engaged in gunplay.²⁸⁷

In other cases, the Court has reached the conclusion that the siege of premises where an armed and dangerous person was located needed to be broken in order to effect an arrest and was therefore justified under the circumstances.²⁸⁸

Quelling riot or insurrection (art. 2(2)(c))

The final category enumerated in article 2(2) of the Convention where lethal force is permissible is 'action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection'. There is a degree of tension between article 2(2)(c) and the right of freedom of peaceful assembly in article 11. On the one hand, the Court has stated that 'where demonstrators do not engage in acts of violence, it is important for the public authorities to show a certain degree of tolerance towards peaceful gatherings if the freedom of assembly guaranteed by Article 11 of the Convention is not to be deprived of all substance'.²⁸⁹ But '[i]n the case of mass demonstrations, which are becoming more and more frequent in a globalised world, the obligation to protect the right to life safeguarded by the Convention necessarily takes on another dimension'.²⁹⁰

The European Commission noted that the legal definition of 'riot' was a matter on which there could be divergences in national practice. It said that, like other concepts in the Convention, it was an 'autonomous' concept to be defined and interpreted by the Commission and the Court.²⁹¹ It declined to provide an exhaustive definition of the term, but said that 'an assembly of 150 persons throwing missiles at a patrol of soldiers to the point that they risked serious injury must be considered, by any standard, to constitute a riot'.²⁹² Determination of the boundary between 'une désobéissance' and 'une insurrection, nécessitant ainsi l'intervention des forces de l'ordre'²⁹³ or 'la tentative de soulèvement',²⁹⁴ permitting application of article 2(2)(c) is a rather subjective determination that has resisted precise clarification in the case law. Context may contribute to the assessment. The Court has shown a considerable degree of deference when this involves a prison environment, given 'le potentiel de violence qui existe dans un établissement pénitentiaire' and 'le fait qu'une désobéissance des détenus puisse dégénérer rapidement en une mutinerie'.²⁹⁵

The Court considered the applicability of 'riot or insurrection' as a justification for killing a Greek Cypriot demonstrator who crossed the border into Turkish-occupied Cyprus and was killed while climbing a flagpole. It noted that it was unclear whether the demonstration was in fact relatively peaceful and under United Nations control, and seemed to accept that 'the demonstrators had sticks and iron bars and were seen throwing stones at the Turkish forces. This led to a situation of tension and to a risk of potentially more violent developments'.²⁹⁶ Without firmly concluding that this was a riot or insurrection, the Court held there was a violation of article 2 because 'a potential illegal or violent action from a group of persons cannot, as such, justify the immediate shooting and killing of one or more other individuals who are not themselves posing a threat'.²⁹⁷

One factor that the Court may consider in assessing the necessity of resort to lethal force will be the number of injuries sustained by law enforcement officials.²⁹⁸ In this respect, the facts may also lend themselves to the application of article 2(2)(a), although there must be precise evidence, rather than generalities, about the violent nature of the confrontation.²⁹⁹

Armed conflict

Article 2 makes no reference to the protection of the right to life during armed conflict. That the Convention might apply during wartime was clearly contemplated by the drafters, because article 15(2) refers to the possibility of derogation from article 2 with respect to 'lawful acts of war'. The Court has not left any doubt about the fact that it considers the obligations imposed by the European Convention, including the procedural obligation of article 2, to apply during armed conflict.³⁰⁰ In a series of decisions, the International Court of Justice has made it clear that human rights law cannot simply be displaced by war. In particular, it has acknowledged the application of the human right to life in time of war but with the caveat that the law of armed conflict operates as a lex specialis.³⁰¹

Application of the law of armed conflict

The law of armed conflict, also described as international humanitarian law, is a distinct body of law whose origins are different from those of international human rights law. Nevertheless, it has many affinities with the international law of human rights, particularly when the treatment of victims of armed conflict, including people under military occupation, are concerned. The two bodies of law may overlap in certain areas. As a general rule, the humanitarian dimension of the law of armed conflict means that it leads to solutions that are similar to, if not identical with, those of human rights law. In some areas, the two bodies of law do not resolve issues in the same way. In Hassan v. The United Kingdom, the European Court acknowledged the difficulty in reconciling the principles dealing with arbitrary detention set out in article 5 with the general permissibility under the law of armed conflict of the internment of civilians. It concluded that the latter should be viewed as compatible with article 5, despite the fact that armed conflict is not dealt with explicitly in the text of the provision.³⁰²

In Hassan, the European Court said it considered that 'even in situations of international armed conflict, the safeguards under the Convention continue to apply, albeit interpreted against the background of the provisions of international humanitarian law'.³⁰³ Previously, the Court had justified its rare references to the law of armed conflict not by a lex specialis principle but rather on the basis of article 31(3)(c) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which authorizes consideration of 'any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties' for the purposes of interpretation.³⁰⁴ The Hassan decision went somewhat further in that it relied not only on the Vienna Convention provision but also on the case law of the International Court of Justice, where the rationale is about reconciling two bodies of law that are not entirely compatible rather than using one body of law as an aid to interpretation of another.³⁰⁵

Whether the consequences of the Hassan ruling will extend to other rights set out in the European Convention remains to be seen. In right-to-life cases, the European Court of Human Rights had been chary of invoking international humanitarian law in its interpretation and application of the European Convention, although invited to do this by both applicants³⁰⁶ and intervening non-governmental organizations.³⁰⁷ Exceptionally, the Court has made reference to the law of armed conflict in the context of article 2 with respect to the treatment of prisoners of war:

Article 2 must be interpreted in so far as possible in light of the general principles of international law, including the rules of international humanitarian law which play an indispensable and universally-accepted role in mitigating the savagery and inhumanity of armed conflict... The Court therefore concurs with the reasoning of the Chamber in holding that in a zone of international conflict Contracting States are under obligation to protect the lives of those not, or no longer, engaged in hostilities. This would also extend to the provision of medical assistance to the wounded; where combatants have died, or succumbed to wounds, the need for accountability would necessitate proper disposal of remains and require the authorities to collect and provide information about the identity and fate of those concerned, or permit bodies such as the ICRC to do so.³⁰⁸

Of particular interest are the rules concerning the use of lethal force by the military and the consequent loss of life of civilians who do not participate actively in hostilities, a phenomenon that commonly goes under the name of 'collateral damage'. Although it does not use this term, familiar in the context of the law of armed conflict, it has acknowledged that military action may have, 'as a regrettable but unavoidable consequence, human casualties'.³⁰⁹ The right to life is also germane to killing of combatants, whether they are organized opposition forces or civilians who participate directly in the conflict. Although the law of armed conflict and the case law of international criminal tribunals dealing with war crimes provide rather detailed answers to these issues, the Court has found the framework of the European Convention entirely adequate to address them without any need to apply other norms or defer to a lex specialis.

In some cases involving essentially military activities, such as artillery attacks where there were civilian casualties, Russia bluntly denied any responsibility. Consequently, as it offered no justification such as military necessity that might excuse such 'collateral damage', the Court summarily concluded that there was a violation of article 2.³¹⁰ But in others it has admitted that it used lethal force as part of military activity directed at insurgents. The Court noted that Russia had not declared martial law or a state of emergency, and that no derogation had been formulated in accordance with article 15 of the European Convention.³¹¹ As a result, the situation was to be judged 'against a normal legal background'.³¹² The expression 'normal legal background' indicates that the Court examines the use of lethal force in military engagements using the same criteria as it would in peacetime law enforcement. This should not mean that as a factual matter there is an absence of armed conflict, however, although in one case the Court made the confused observation that an aerial attack in Chechnya took place 'outside wartime'.³¹³ The Court has not had to address the scope of the term 'lawful acts of war', something that might be required had Russia effectively derogated from article 2.

Legitimate aim and proportionality

Before examining the proportionality of the use of lethal force, the Court must first determine whether it is in pursuit of a legitimate aim contemplated by article 2(2) of the Convention. Where Russian planes bombed a village killing several inhabitants, the Court said the justifications provided by paragraphs (a) and (b) of article 2(2) did not apply because of a lack of 'reliable evidence that any unlawful violence was threatened or likely, or that the lethal force was used in an attempt to effect a lawful arrest of any person'. It added that 'even assuming that the use of lethal force in the present case can be said to have pursued any of the aforementioned aims, the Court does not consider that the Government properly accounted for the use of that force resulting in the deaths of the five residents'.³¹⁴ It described the attack as 'indiscriminate bombing'.³¹⁵ In others, however, the Court has accepted that the use of lethal force by the military may have been necessary. In a case involving aerial attacks on a residential neighbourhood in a fortified village, the State relied upon article 2(2)(a), invoking 'the need to eliminate a danger to the local population emanating from illegal fighters' occupying the town at the time. So-called 'pinpoint aerial strikes' were used to enable Russian forces to retake the town. Russia argued that air power was necessary, citing the concern that a land operation 'would have led to considerable losses among federal servicemen'.³¹⁶ The Court admitted that this argument was 'not without foundation'.³¹⁷ In another, bombs were dropped on a civilian convoy at the border between Chechnya and Ingushetia. Russian authorities had issued a press statement denying civilian damage, claiming that a column of trucks with fighters and ammunition had provoked the encounter by firing upon a government aircraft.³¹⁸ The Court stated that it was 'prepared to accept that if the planes were attacked by illegal armed groups, that could have justified use of lethal force, thus falling within paragraph 2 of Article 2'.³¹⁹

More generally, the justification for the use of lethal force must be to pursue a lawful purpose. In the Chechen jurisprudence, the Court has accepted that Russia was entitled to repress a secessionist movement. Thus, its findings were essentially confined to the norms applicable to the conduct of the armed forces, the jus in bello. The argument that killing of non-combatants in a conflict conducted in violation of international law, that is, contrary to jus ad bellum, would be per se contrary to the European Convention, regardless of issues of necessity and proportionality, remains to be considered by the Court. One of the consequences of the lex specialis approach of the International Court of Justice is to confine the examination of the applicable law during armed conflict to the jus in bello, as this is the frame within which the law of armed conflict sits. Yet article 2 of the European Convention necessarily requires that the use of lethal force be pursuant to legitimate purpose. Killing that results from resort to illegal war and acts of aggression could never meet this standard and would be prima facie a violation of the human right to life.

Even if the use of lethal force is deemed to be justifiable for legitimate military purposes, the Court must still assess the proportionality of the actual measures. This inquiry generally focuses on targeting and on choice of weapons. In one case, Russia attempted to justify the use of force where a bomb dropped by a Russian plane exploded near the minivan of the applicant and her relatives as they were fleeing the village of Katyryurt through what they had perceived as a safe exit from heavy fighting. The Court said:

the State's responsibility was not confined to circumstances where there was significant evidence that misdirected fire from agents of the state has killed a civilian. It may also be engaged where they fail to take all feasible precautions in the choice of means and methods of a security operation mounted against an opposing group with a view to avoiding and, in any event, minimising, incidental loss of civilian life.³²⁰

In a case involving aerial attacks on a residential neighbourhood in a fortified village, the Court said it was 'not convinced, having regard to the materials at its disposal, that the necessary degree of care was exercised in preparing the operation of 19 October 1999 in such a way as to avoid or minimise, to the greatest extent possible, the risk of a loss of life, both for the persons at whom the measures were directed and for civilians'.³²¹ Another judgment condemned the use of aviation bombs in a populated area without prior evacuation of the civilians as being 'impossible to reconcile with the degree of caution expected'.³²² In the border convoy case, the Court said that 'even assuming that the military were pursuing a legitimate aim in launching 12 S-24 non-guided air-to-ground missiles on 29 October 1999, the Court does not accept that the operation near the village of Shaami-Yurt was planned and executed with the requisite care for the lives of the civilian population'.³²³

In one case, the Court found that Turkish warplanes had bombed Kurdish villages. Turkey had denied the acts and therefore had not invoked any of the grounds set out in article 2(2) in defence. The Court said that in any case, 'indiscriminate aerial bombardment of civilians and their villages cannot be acceptable in a democratic society . . . and cannot be reconcilable with any of the grounds regulating the use of force which are set out in Article 2 § 2 of the Convention or, indeed, with the customary rules of international humanitarian law or any of the international treaties regulating the use of force in armed conflicts'.³²⁴ In this respect, the Court referred to common article 3 to the Geneva Conventions, which sets minimum standards applicable to non-international armed conflict.³²⁵ The reference was not particularly precise because common article 3 governs protected persons rather than the conduct of hostilities, which was the core of the issue in the Kurdish village case.

These issues are also very familiar within the context of the law of armed conflict. At the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, for example, the minimization of civilian casualties has been addressed in the context of artillery attacks on cities and towns where the legal framework is the law of armed conflict rather than the law of human rights.³²⁶ United Nations fact-finding commissions have made similar assessments using the law of armed conflict, but combined with human rights law. Investigating Israeli shelling of Palestinian settlements in Gaza in 2009, the Commission established by the Human Rights Council concluded that there had been a violation of the right to life and a violation of the obligation in the law of armed conflict, set out in article 57(2)(a)(ii) of the first Optional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions, because of a failure to '[t]ake all feasible precautions in the choice of means and methods of attack with a view to avoiding, and in any event to minimising, incidental loss of civilian life'.³²⁷

Within the law of armed conflict there is some debate, however, about whether those participating in combat can be targets of lethal force even if this is not strictly necessary to achieve the military objective.³²⁸ The International Committee of the Red Cross has taken the view that even combatants benefit from a right to life to the extent that 'the kind and degree of force which is permissible against persons not entitled to protection against direct attack must not exceed what is actually necessary to accomplish a legitimate military purpose in the prevailing circumstances'.³²⁹ This position finds support in the work of Jean Pictet, who wrote: 'If we can put a soldier out of action by capturing him, we should not wound him; if we can obtain the same result by wounding him, we must not kill him. If there are two means to achieve the same military advantage, we must choose the one which causes the lesser evil'.³³⁰ Along similar lines, Hersch Lauterpacht wrote that the law on conduct of hostilities 'must be shaped—so far as it can be shaped at all—by reference not to existing law but to more compelling considerations of humanity, of the survival of civilisation, and of the sanctity of the individual human being'.³³¹ Such conclusions flow inexorably from the earliest codifications of the law of armed conflict, the 1868 Declaration of St Petersburg and the 1899 Martens Clause.³³² Thus, when combatants as well as non-combatants who participated actively in hostilities are concerned, it is also possible for the two legal systems to find common ground. Even combatants, even 'terrorists', benefit from the right to life, and cannot be deprived of it unless this is absolutely necessary.³³³

Discrimination

The provision prohibiting discrimination, article 14, does not have an independent existence because it applies only to 'the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms' safeguarded by other provisions of Convention law. Nevertheless, it is autonomous to the extent that it does not require that there be a breach of one of the other substantive provisions. Article 14 is applicable when 'the facts at issue fall "within the ambit" of one or more of the latter'.³³⁴ It can hardly be doubted that there are many manifestations of life-threatening violence perpetrated in Europe where the motivation may be discrimination or hatred directed against one of the groups listed in article 14. Most, if not all, of this will involve acts perpetrated by individuals. In such cases, the State's responsibility may be engaged under the procedural wing of article 2. The Court has rejected the argument formulated by a respondent State that article 14 could only be invoked in the case of violence attributable directly to the State where discriminatory motives may have been involved.³³⁵

There do not appear to have been any findings that the substantive obligation contained in article 2 have been violated in conjunction with article 14. In a dissenting opinion, Judge Bonello said he found it 'particularly disturbing that the Court, in over fifty years of pertinacious judicial scrutiny, has not, to date, found one single instance of violation of the right to life . . . induced by the race, colour or place of origin of the victim'. He lamented the impression given by the jurisprudence of the Convention organs of Europe as 'an exemplary haven of ethnic fraternity, in which peoples of the most diverse origin coalesce without distress, prejudice or recrimination. The present case energises that delusion'.³³⁶ The Court seems to require proof beyond a reasonable doubt of racist motivation,³³⁷ making this extraordinarily difficult to establish in practice.

Where there are suspicions of a racist dimension to lethal attacks on individuals, the State authorities are required to investigate the presence of such prohibited or aggravating motives. According to the Court,

States have a general obligation under Article 2 of the Convention to conduct an effective investigation in cases of deprivation of life. That obligation must be discharged without discrimination, as required by Article 14 of the Convention . . . [W]here there is suspicion that racial attitudes induced a violent act it is particularly important that the official investigation is pursued with vigour and impartiality, having regard to the need to reassert continuously society's condemnation of racism and ethnic hatred and to maintain the confidence of minorities in the ability of the authorities to protect them from the threat of racist violence. Compliance with the State's positive obligations under Article 2 of the Convention requires that the domestic legal system must demonstrate its capacity to enforce criminal law against those who unlawfully took the life of another, irrespective of the victim's racial or ethnic origin.³³⁸

The Court has acknowledged that it may often be difficult in practice to establish racist motives. According to the Court, '[l]'absence de distinction dans la façon dont des situations qui sont essentiellement différentes sont gérées peut constituer un traitement injustifié inconciliable avec l'article 14 de la Convention'.³³⁹ Where there was no question about the racism behind murderous attacks, the Court held that the State had breached article 14 by failing to charge racially motivated offences.³⁴⁰ In a Bulgarian case, the government had argued that the investigators did not have sufficient indications of racist motivation but the Court pointed to a number of factors that showed the contrary. It concluded that in the course of an investigation that took thirteen years, the failure of the Bulgarian authorities to investigate the possibility of racist motivation constituted a violation of article 14 in conjunction with article 2.³⁴¹ In a case involving Roma victims in Ukraine, the Court considered that suspicions of racist motivation were justified by the widespread discrimination and violence against Roma in Ukraine as explained in reports of the European Centre on Racism and Intolerance. Consequently, the Court said 'it cannot be excluded that the decision to burn the houses of the alleged drug traffickers had been additionally nourished by ethnic hatred and thus it necessitated verification'.³⁴²

A similar approach was taken by the Court in a case involving violence against women. It noted that 'the general and discriminatory judicial passivity in Turkey [to domestic violence against women] created a climate that was conducive to domestic violence' and contributed to the murder of a woman by her husband. The Court said this was a violation of article 14 taken in conjunction with articles 2.³⁴³

In Italy, the government provided a compensation scheme for persons who had been contaminated with the human immunodeficiency virus by blood transfusions. The Court noted that it was not required by the Convention to do this but once it had done so it was necessary to implement the programme without discrimination. However, while available to haemophiliacs, it was not offered to persons with thalassemia. The Court concluded that this was a violation of article 14 in conjunction with article 2, in that the applicants were victims of discrimination based upon genetic features.³⁴⁴

Reservations

At the time of signature, on 12 December 1966, and ratification, on 23 January 1967, Malta made a reservation regarding 'the principle of lawful defence', stating that it was to apply in Malta to defence of property to the extent required by provisions of its Criminal Code. The reservation was accompanied by the texts of sections 737 and 738 of the Criminal Code, where it is stated that '[c]ases of actual necessity of lawful defence' include: 'where the homicide or bodily harm is committed in the act of repelling, during the night-time, the scaling or breaking of enclosures, walls, or the entrance doors of any house or inhabited apartment, or of the appurtenances thereof having a direct or an indirect communication with such house or apartment' and 'where the homicide or

Upon ratification in 1982, Liechtenstein made a reservation to article 2(2)(a) stating that the principle of self-defence 'shall in the Principality of Liechtenstein also apply to the defence of property and freedom in accordance with the principles at present embodied in Article 2, paragraph (g) of the Liechtenstein Criminal Code of 27 May 1852'. The reservation was withdrawn in 1991.³⁴⁶

Article 3. Prohibition of torture/Interdiction de la torture

No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Nul ne peut être soumis à la torture ni à des peines ou traitements inhumains ou dégradants.

Introductory comments

The prohibition of torture, and of inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, is frequently cited as one of the most absolute and sacred of fundamental human rights. As the Court has noted, 'the prohibition of torture occupies a prominent place in all international instruments on the protection of human rights'.¹ In the Convention, the prohibition is formulated concisely in fifteen words, by far the shortest normative provision in the entire instrument. Furthermore, it is given a privileged position as the second right on the list, immediately following the right to life, with which it is often associated. It is true that there is no formal hierarchy in the list of fundamental rights. But it cannot be gainsaid that attention is directed to the special significance of a right when it is placed close to the beginning of the Convention.

The International Court of Justice has described the prohibition of torture as part of customary international law, adding that it has become a peremptory norm (jus cogens). The Court explained:

That prohibition is grounded in a widespread international practice and on the opinio juris of States. It appears in numerous international instruments of universal application (in particular the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, the 1949 Geneva Conventions for the protection of war victims; the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966; General Assembly resolution 3452/30 of 9 December 1975 on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment), and it has been introduced into the domestic law of almost all States; finally, acts of torture are regularly denounced within national and international fora.²

Article 3 of the Convention closely resembles article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, from which it is derived. The only difference is omission of the word 'cruel' in article 3 of the European Convention, an apparently inadvertent change and a difference to which probably no legal consequences should be attached. The first sentence of the corresponding provision in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is identical to that of the Universal Declaration. However, a second sentence is added to the text of the Covenant: 'In particular, no one shall be subjected without his free consent to medical or scientific experimentation.'³ A specialized treaty, the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, completes the United Nations system of human rights instruments.⁴

The European Charter of Fundamental Rights proclaims the prohibition of torture in terms that are identical to the text of article 3 of the Convention except that the title of article 4 of the Charter is 'Prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'. The provision is meant to have the same meaning and scope as article 2 of the European Convention.⁵ Article 19(2) of the European Charter also proclaims a principle of non-refoulement: 'No one may be removed, expelled or extradited to a State where there is a serious risk that he or she would be subjected to the death penalty, torture or other inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.' It is also meant to have the same meaning and scope as article 3 of the European Convention, 'as interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights'.⁶

The extraordinary attention devoted to the issue of torture in the field of human rights has resulted in specialized instruments with bodies for their monitoring and implementation. Within the Council of Europe, the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment provides for the establishment of the Committee for the Prevention of Torture. It has the authority to make unannounced visits to 'places of detention' within all Member States of the Council of Europe.

Drafting of the provision

The initial draft European Convention on Human Rights, prepared by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement, did not closely follow the Universal Declaration, with its autonomous provision on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The enumeration of rights in the draft began: 'Every State a party to this Convention shall guarantee to all persons within its territory the following rights: a) Security of life and limb.'⁷ This seems surprising, given that two of the rapporteurs responsible for drafting the text, David Maxwell Fyfe and Fernand Dehousse, had been involved in the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights at the United Nations the previous year.

Asked to prepare a text for discussion in the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions at the first session of the Consultative Assembly, held from 22 August to 5 September 1949, Pierre-Henri Teitgen proposed the following: 'Security of person, in accordance with Articles 3, 5 and 8 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations General Assembly.'⁸ At its sitting of 29 August 1949 the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions accepted inclusion of 'the safety of the person, as laid down in Articles 3, 5 and 8 of the Universal Declaration on [sic] Human Rights'.⁹ The word 'safety' was evidently an awkward translation of the French sûreté and was changed to security—the term used in article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights—in the final report adopted by the Committee: 'Security of person, in accordance with Articles 3, 5 and 8 of the United Nations Declaration'.¹⁰ Yet, despite the references to article 5 of the Declaration, the word 'torture' was not even mentioned.

In presenting his draft report to the Commission on Legal and Administrative Questions to the first Session of the Consultative Assembly, Teitgen said that 'in recommending a collective guarantee not only of freedom to express convictions, but also of thought, conscience, religion and opinion, the Committee wished to protect all nationals of any member State, not only from breaches of obligation for so-called reasons of State, but also from those abominable methods of police enquiry or judicial process which rob the suspected or accused person of control of his intellectual faculties and of conscience'.¹¹ In the debate on the report of the Commission on Legal and Administrative Questions in the Consultative Assembly, Seymour Cocks, of the British Labour Party, proposed:

In particular no person shall be subjected to any form of mutilation or sterilisation, nor to any form of torture or beating. Nor shall he be forced to take drugs nor shall they be administered to him without his knowledge and consent. Nor shall he be subjected to imprisonment with such an excess of light, darkness, noise or silence as to cause mental suffering.¹²

This was withdrawn by the proposer and replaced with:

The Consultative Assembly takes this opportunity of declaring that all forms of physical torture, whether inflicted by the police, military authorities, members of private organisations or any other persons are inconsistent with civilised society, are offences against heaven and humanity and must be prohibited.

They declare that this prohibition must be absolute and that torture cannot be permitted by any purpose whatsoever, neither by extracting evidence for saving life nor even for the safety of the State.

They believe that it would be better even for Society to perish than for it to permit this relic of barbarism to remain.¹³

Explaining his proposal in the Consultative Assembly, Cocks said the object was to give greater emphasis to the condemnation of torture. He described how as a child he had been taught that torture belonged to ancient civilizations but that it had been 'done away with hundreds of years ago, that the world had become civilised'. But '[t]he most terrible event in my lifetime in this century has been that torture and violence have returned—returned fortified by many discoveries of modern science—and that in many countries people are even becoming accustomed to it'.¹⁴ After explanations that the matter was already adequately addressed, through the reference to article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Cocks agreed to withdraw his proposal.¹⁵

The Consultative Assembly adopted the text proposed by the Committee.¹⁶ But a report prepared by the Secretariat-General following the adoption of the Consultative Assembly text compared the latter with the draft International Covenant being considered by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and noted that the explicit prohibition of torture was '[e]xcluded from the European system' and would instead be the subject of a solemn declaration to be adopted by the Assembly.¹⁷ If this was a genuine omission, the matter was soon addressed in proposed amendments from the United Kingdom. It submitted a text identical to article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.' Accompanying the proposal was a second sentence, taken from the draft International Covenant considered by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in mid-1949: 'No one shall be subjected to any form of physical mutilation or medical or scientific experimentation against his will.'¹⁸

At the conclusion of its first session, in February 1950, the Committee of Experts adopted the following provision: 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.'¹⁹ The report of the Committee explains that instead of enumerating rights by reference to the relevant provision in the Universal Declaration, as had been done by the Consultative Assembly, it was better to incorporate the text verbatim. Accordingly, the Committee 'scrupulously adhered to the text of the Universal Declaration'.²⁰ The text it adopted is, of course, identical to article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. At the second session of the Committee of Experts, in March 1950, the United Kingdom representative submitted an amendment that removed the adjectives 'cruel' and 'degrading': 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman treatment or punishment.'²¹

The Committee of Experts submitted two different drafts to the Committee of Ministers. The first, 'Alternatives A and A/2', consisted of the text adopted by the Committee of Experts at its first session and that was taken verbatim from article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.²² The second, labelled 'Alternatives B and B/2', contained the most recent text proposed by the United Kingdom.²³

The Conference of Senior Officials that convened in June 1950 assigned a Drafting Committee to attempt to reconcile the competing versions. It prepared a new formulation of the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment that corresponds to the final version of article 3 of the European Convention.²⁴ The published travaux préparatoires do not indicate whether any distinction in substance was intended by comparison with article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in particular the absence of the word 'cruel' in the European Convention. Usually, the British preference was for the more detailed and precise text. It would have made sense for the British and their allies to agree to the more detailed formulation of article 5 of the Universal Declaration. The Drafting Committee text became the definitive one in the draft adopted by the Conference of Senior Officials²⁵ and was confirmed by the Committee of Ministers at its fifth session in August 1950.²⁶

The heading 'Prohibition of torture' was added pursuant to the provisions of Protocol No. 11.²⁷

Analysis and interpretation

Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights 'enshrines one of the most fundamental values of democratic societies'.²⁸ The prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is set out in 'absolute terms', making 'no provision for exceptions'.²⁹ Indeed, 'even in the most difficult of circumstances, such as the fight against organised terrorism and crime, the Convention prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.³⁰ As an absolute prohibition, it applies regardless of the conduct of the victim³¹ or the nature of any offence that has allegedly been committed.³² The European Court has rejected the suggestion that it should apply article 3 more flexibly, in particular in cases involving expulsion or refoulement, simply because the alleged victim is associated with terrorist activities.³³

In this respect, the Court has noted the comparison between article 3 and most of the other substantive clauses of the Convention and the Protocols, where exceptions and derogation are allowed.³⁴ It is perhaps not surprising that the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment might be more absolute than the right to marry or to property or the prohibition of imprisonment for debt, for example. But this observation also holds true for the right to life, for which there are both exceptions or limitations and the possibility of derogation. One of the enigmas of human rights law is the apparent absolute prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment set alongside the acceptance of limitations on the right to life, including capital punishment and killing in armed conflict.

Under the European Convention, there is no particular consequence to the distinction between torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In either case, there is a violation of article 3 of the Convention. This contrasts, for example, with the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, where certain obligations apply only in the case of torture and not with respect to other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. One of the differences between torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment that is often signalled concerns the severity of the measure. Apparently, all torture will also be inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, but not all inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment will be torture. In a sense, therefore, torture is the lex specialis.

Allegations of torture or ill-treatment frequently raise challenging evidentiary issues. The Court requires 'appropriate evidence'³⁵ that satisfies a standard of proof 'beyond reasonable doubt'.³⁶ Such proof 'may follow from the coexistence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences or of similar un rebutted presumptions of fact'.³⁷

The victim

Article 3 begins with the words 'No one', a formulation that is favoured when the Convention sets out a prohibition. The same expression is also used in articles 4 and 7 and in Protocol No. 4 (arts 1 and 3), No. 6 (art. 1), No. 7 (art. 4), No. 12 (art. 1, and No. 13 (art. 1). Personal characteristics play a role in determining whether or not an individual may be considered a victim of torture or ill-treatment.

The Court has said that it will consider various factors including sex, age, and state of health of the victim in its assessment.³⁸ There are several examples in the case law of age being considered relevant in this respect. In Soering v. the United Kingdom, for example, the plenary Court concluded that there was a real risk of ill-treatment taking into consideration the applicant's age and mental state. Soering was nineteen at the time of the offence for which he faced the death penalty, although he was nearly twenty-four when the Court issued its judgment declaring that extradition to the United States to stand trial would raise a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment.³⁹ In assessing the seriousness of injuries sustained in police custody by an older person, the Court considered that they fell within the scope of article 3 in light of 'the applicant's advanced age—67 years at the relevant time'.⁴⁰ The two-month detention by Belgian authorities of a five-year-old child in an immigration centre where similar incarceration of adults would not raise any particular difficulties 'demonstrated a lack of humanity to such a degree that it amounted to inhuman treatment'.⁴¹ The 'tender age' of an eight-year-old girl, who was a victim of physical violence by her father, and who also witnessed her mother being abused, was significant in a finding that article 3 applied.⁴² But in a case involving corporal punishment of a seven-year-old in a boarding school, only two dissenters within the European Commission attached significance to the young age of the applicant.⁴³

Family members of victims of serious human rights violations may themselves be victims of a violation of article 3. In order to conclude that there has been a separate violation of article 3 with respect to relatives, the Grand Chamber has insisted upon special factors 'giving their suffering a dimension and character distinct from the emotional distress inevitably stemming' from the initial violation.⁴⁴ These include the proximity of the family tie, the circumstances of the relationship, the extent the family member witnessed the events in question and involvement in the attempts to obtain information about the fate of the victims of the primary violation.⁴⁵ There have been findings of a separate violation of article 3 with respect to close family members who have directly witnessed the suffering or death of their relatives that was in itself a violation of the Convention.⁴⁶ Examples include a mother who witnessed the slow death in detention of her son and was unable to help him,⁴⁷ applicants who saw the killing of family members and neighbours,⁴⁸ and parents who were unable to bury the dismembered and decapitated bodies of their children in a proper manner⁴⁹ or who were presented with a mutilated corpse.⁵⁰ The detention of a five-year-old caused 'deep distress and anxiety' to the mother, resulting in a violation of article 3.⁵¹

The issue of collateral consequences for family members is especially relevant in the case of forced disappearances as the act itself is often followed by a long period of uncertainty, ending in some cases with the discovery of the body and confirmation of death. According to the Grand Chamber, '[t]he essence of the issue under Article 3 in this type of case lies not so much in a serious violation of the missing person's human rights but rather in the authorities' dismissive reactions and attitudes in respect of that situation when it was brought to their attention'.⁵² In that sense, there is a close relationship to the procedural obligation. In effect, certain breaches of the procedural obligation thereby amount to substantive acts of ill-treatment or torture that are distinct from those acts that were the basis of the procedural obligation. The Court has generally refused to consider that article 3 has been breached in this manner in cases where the disappearance is for a relatively short period,⁵³ when there has been a finding that both the substantive and procedural aspects of article 2 have been violated,⁵⁴ and in cases of killing by the authorities given that there is no uncertainty about the fate of the victim.⁵⁵ Dismissing a claim submitted by relatives of the victim of the Katyn massacre, which took place in 1940, the Grand Chamber held that given the long lapse of time since the killings and material that came to light over the years, it was no longer accurate to speak of uncertainty about the fate of the victims, at least with respect to the period since Russia's ratification of the European Convention. Consequently, 'it cannot be held that the applicants' suffering reached a dimension and character distinct from the emotional distress which may be regarded as inevitably caused to relatives of victims of a serious human rights violation'.⁵⁶

Threshold of application of article 3

In establishing the threshold for the application of article 3, the case law of the Court speaks of 'ill-treatment' attaining a 'minimum level of severity [that] involves actual bodily injury or intense physical or mental suffering'.⁵⁷ The assessment of the minimum level is 'relative' and depends on the circumstances, bearing in mind such factors as the duration of the treatment, its physical and mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age, and state of health of the victim.⁵⁸ In circumstances where treatment does not reach the level required for application of article 3, it may nevertheless engage issues relating to article 8 of the Convention.

Clearly, not all punishment is contemplated by article 3; it must necessarily be 'inhuman or degrading'. In order for a punishment or treatment associated with it to be 'inhuman' or 'degrading', or to amount to torture, the suffering or humiliation involved must go beyond that which is inevitably connected with a given form of legitimate treatment or punishment.⁵⁹ As for torture, because the Convention organs have tended to treat it as an extreme or aggravating form of ill-treatment, comprised within the concept of 'inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment', there can be no notion of insignificant or minor torture.

Examples of the severity of bodily harm inflicted by State agents that the Court has considered to reach the required degree of severity include an injury to a person's leg which caused necrosis and subsequently led to the leg being amputated, a gunshot wound to a person's knee, a double fracture of the jaw and facial contusions or an injury to a person's face that required stitches, with three of the person's teeth being knocked out.⁶⁰ Suffering that results from illness, be it physical or mental, may also fall under article 3 where it is or risks being exacerbated by treatment for which the authorities are responsible.⁶¹ For example, an AIDS sufferer was threatened with removal from the United Kingdom to St Kitts, where there was no appropriate treatment available, either medical or palliative. He would have faced a risk of dying under the 'most distressing circumstances', a situation aggravated by the State Party and therefore a treatment contemplated by article 3.⁶² Bullying and harassment of a mentally disabled man by local children, including spitting, verbal abuse, and the infliction of cigarette burns, where a racist dimension was present, amounted to a breach of article 3.⁶³ However, extending the notion of 'treatment' to the refusal of the prosecuting authority to make an undertaking not to take proceedings against the husband of a terminally ill patient if he were to assist her in taking her own life 'places a new and extended construction on the concept of treatment [that] goes beyond the ordinary meaning of the word'.⁶⁴ In his separate opinion in the Ireland v. the United Kingdom case, Judge Fitzmaurice warned of the temptation to lower the threshold, explaining that 'the Convention contains no prohibition covering intermediate forms of maltreatment'.⁶⁵

Often the Court has considered that ill-treatment does not reach the threshold of article 3 but has held that there was a violation of article 8 of the Convention. For example, it declined to conclude there had been a violation of article 3 in an application from the victim of environmental damage caused by the location of a waste processing plant that was responsible for health problems. Agreeing with the claim under article 8, the Court appeared to accept that the 'well-being' of the victims had been affected adversely 'without, however, seriously endangering their health'.⁶⁶ Where two members of the armed forces were discharged because they were homosexual, the Court concluded that article 8 had been violated but declined to apply article 3. Saying it accepted that the anti-homosexual policy as well as the resulting investigation and discharge 'were undoubtedly distressing and humiliating for each of the applicants', nevertheless the Court did not consider, 'having regard to all the circumstances of the case, that the treatment reached the minimum level of severity which would bring it within the scope of Article 3 of the Convention'.⁶⁷

Even in a case of police brutality directed at a seventy-two-year-old victim, the Court said that 'the injuries suffered by the applicant were restricted to the area of his hands and that the degree of bruising established during the medical examination of 20 December 1996 was not particularly excessive or severe in nature'.⁶⁸ Consequently, there was no breach of article 3, although three of the seven judges in the Chamber dissented, noting that '[t]he Court has constantly held in its case-law that in respect of a person deprived of his liberty recourse to physical force which has not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminishes human dignity and is in principle an infringement of the right set forth in Article 3'.⁶⁹ In a case involving difficulty in obtaining gender reassignment surgery, the Court said the situation, 'whilst revealing the applicant's understandable distress and frustration, does not indicate circumstances of such an intense degree, involving the exceptional, life-threatening conditions'. As a result, it opted to treat the complaint under article 8 rather than article 3.⁷⁰ It reached the same conclusion where the applicant was threatened with a criminal sanction for wearing a full-face veil or burqa.⁷¹

Many problems in defining the threshold arise in the context of detention and imprisonment, where an element of ill-treatment is almost inherent in the circumstances.⁷² The Court declined finding a violation of article 3 in a case where a detainee was being transferred from the Netherlands to a prison in Curaçao that had been condemned by the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture. The Court said this did not automatically mean there was a breach of article 3, noting that the complaint was confined to allegations of a lack of access to running water and sanitary facilities, insufficient furniture, and the state of the telephones.⁷³ Requiring inmates to use an unenclosed toilet when they share a cell constitutes degrading treatment.⁷⁴ Detention conditions in Russian police stations, where applicants have no food, drink, or toilet access, have frequently been held to violate article 3.⁷⁵ In a strip search of visitors to a prison, one of whom was severely disabled, the Court held that 'there was a regrettable lack of courtesy [but] there was no verbal abuse by the prison officers and, importantly, there was no touching'. Consequently, although the treatment 'undoubtedly caused the applicants distress', it did not reach the article 3 threshold. The Court found there was a violation of article 8, nevertheless.⁷⁶ Complete sensory isolation coupled with total social isolation can destroy the personality, amounting to inhuman treatment that cannot be justified by the requirements of security or any other reason. But prohibition of contacts with other prisoners for security, disciplinary, or protective reasons does not in itself constitute a violation of article 3.⁷⁷ The Court rejected a claim based on article 3 in the case of a prisoner who had served ten years of a fifteen-year sentence after initially been sentenced to death and who was transferred, without any lawful basis, to a more severe detention regime than the one to which he was entitled. The Court acknowledged that although '[t]he fact that the applicant was aware that his transfer was not lawful and that his complaint did not stop the execution of the decision to transfer him would certainly have generated psychological distress going beyond that which is inextricably linked to imprisonment as such', the eighteen-day duration of the measures was not sufficient to constitute a breach of article 3.⁷⁸

There is no general obligation resulting from article 3 requiring the release of a prisoner on health grounds or transfer to a hospital, even where the illness is particularly difficult to treat.⁷⁹ Nevertheless, the authorities have an obligation to provide a detained person with adequate medical care.⁸⁰ In particular, where detainees suffer from mental illness, it is necessary to take into account their vulnerability as well as their incapacity, in some cases, to complain about their circumstances.⁸¹ A detainee who was found to be suffering from mental illness and who was transferred to a psychiatric ward of the prison hospital complained of inhuman treatment. The Court insisted that despite an inevitable degree of suffering, it could not state that detention on remand in and of itself raised an issue under article 3, nor could the provision 'be interpreted as laying down a general obligation to release a detainee on health grounds or to place him in a civil hospital to enable him to obtain a particular kind of medical treatment'.⁸² The Court has also considered cases involving serious illness,⁸³ disability,⁸⁴ the elderly,⁸⁵ and withdrawal from drug addiction⁸⁶ in this context.

Distinguishing torture from inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

Torture is not defined in either the European Convention on Human Rights or the specialized instrument adopted by the Council of Europe on the subject, the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. The case law of the Court has generally approached torture as an aggravated form of ill-treatment. However, from the earliest decisions of the Commission, the case law has also insisted upon a deliberate and purposive dimension of torture, aimed at obtaining of information or confession or the infliction of punishment.⁸⁷

In the seminal case on the subject, the inter-State application filed by Ireland against the United Kingdom, the Court said 'this distinction derives principally from a difference in the intensity of the suffering inflicted'.⁸⁸ The Court supported its interpretation with reference to the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1975, which stated: 'Torture constitutes an aggravated and deliberate form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.⁸⁹

The context is important here, because in the Ireland v. the United Kingdom case the Court did not refer to the entire definition in the 1975 Declaration. Paragraph 1 of the Declaration centres the analysis on the purpose of the ill-treatment rather than its severity:

For the purpose of this Declaration, torture means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted by or at the instigation of a public official on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or confession, punishing him for an act he has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating him or other persons. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions to the extent consistent with the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners.

The isolated reference to paragraph 2 of the 1975 Declaration was used by the Court to justify its conclusion, in the subsequent sentence of its judgment, that the so-called five techniques used by the British on detainees in Northern Ireland 'did not occasion suffering of the particular intensity and cruelty implied by the word torture as so understood'.⁹⁰ In the Ireland v. the United Kingdom case, the Court said that:

whilst there exists on the one hand violence which is to be condemned both on moral grounds and also in most cases under the domestic law of the Contracting States but which does not fall within Article 3 (art. 3) of the Convention, it appears on the other hand that it was the intention that the Convention, with its distinction between 'torture' and 'inhuman or degrading treatment, should by the first of these terms attach a special stigma to deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering'.⁹¹

It has returned again and again to this formulation.⁹²

Subsequent decisions of the European Court have attempted to trace the parameters of torture by using severity as the central criterion. In Aksoy v. Turkey, the Court found that the applicant had been subjected to 'Palestinian hanging' whereby he was stripped naked with his arms tied together behind his back and then suspended by his arms. Medical evidence showed this led to a paralysis for a period of time. It said 'this treatment was of such a serious and cruel nature that it can only be described as torture'.⁹³ Another involved a Turkish detainee who was raped by an unnamed prison official, something 'considered to be an especially grave and abhorrent form of ill-treatment given the ease with which the offender can exploit the vulnerability and weakened resistance of his victim'. She was also subjected to various other 'particularly terrifying and humiliating experiences' as well as being 'paraded naked in humiliating circumstances thus adding to her overall sense of vulnerability and on one occasion she was pummelled with high-pressure water while being spun around in a tyre'.⁹⁴ The Court concluded that 'the accumulation of acts of physical and mental violence inflicted on the applicant and the especially cruel act of rape to which she was subjected amounted to torture'.⁹⁵

Then, with reference to the 'living instrument' doctrine of interpretation, the Court's position began to evolve. In Selmouni v. France, the Grand Chamber said that 'certain acts which were classified in the past as "inhuman and degrading treatment" as opposed to "torture" could be classified differently in future'.⁹⁶ This was warranted because 'the increasingly high standard being required in the area of the protection of human rights and fundamental liberties correspondingly and inevitably requires greater firmness in assessing breaches of the fundamental values of democratic societies'.⁹⁷ Selmouni was brutally interrogated by French law enforcement officers, who suspected his involvement in drug traffic. The Court said that '[w]hatever a person's state of health, it can be presumed that such intensity of blows will cause substantial pain'. It continued its description of the ill-treatment:

The Court also notes that the applicant was dragged along by his hair; that he was made to run along a corridor with police officers positioned on either side to trip him up; that he was made to kneel down in front of a young woman to whom someone said 'Look, you're going to hear somebody sing'; that one police officer then showed him his penis, saying 'Here, suck this', before urinating over him; and that he was threatened with a blowlamp and then a syringe... Besides the violent nature of the above acts, the Court is bound to observe that they would be heinous and humiliating for anyone, irrespective of their condition.⁹⁸

The Grand Chamber said it was 'satisfied that the physical and mental violence, considered as a whole, committed against the applicant's person caused "severe" pain and suffering and was particularly serious and cruel'.⁹⁹ The Court put the word 'severe' in inverted commas in order to make it clear that it was referring to this term as it appears in article 1 of the United Nations Convention against Torture. It said it considered that this notion of severity was similar to the 'minimum severity' required for the application of article 3 of the European Convention, something that is necessarily, 'in the nature of things, relative'. The Grand Chamber said this 'depends on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical or mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim, etc.'.¹⁰⁰ But that is the extent of the Grand Chamber's methodological and analytical clarity in its attempt to broaden the definition of torture.

A year later, the Grand Chamber acknowledged that '[i]n addition to the severity of the treatment, there is a purposive element', citing in support the United Nations Convention.¹⁰¹ Article 1 of the Convention Against Torture, adopted in 1984, develops the approach taken in article 1(1) of the 1975 Declaration, which of course also includes the purposive element that the European Court had ignored in the Ireland v. the United Kingdom case:

For the purposes of this Convention, torture means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.

Principally, the 1984 Convention adds the reference to 'any reason based on discrimination of any kind' and, more importantly, requires that torture be 'inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity'. According to the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture, commenting on the interpretation of the 1984 Convention, the decisive criteria for distinguishing torture from cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment 'may best be understood to be the purpose of the conduct and the powerlessness of the victim, rather than the intensity of the pain or suffering inflicted'.¹⁰² Although presented as an innovation in the case law of the Court, the observation that torture amounts to 'inhuman treatment, which has a purpose, such as the obtaining of information or confession, or the infliction of punishment', can actually be found in an early decision of the European Commission of Human Rights.¹⁰³

On the sliding scale between torture and inhuman or degrading treatment the relative proportions may have evolved as the Court has become less demanding in making a finding of torture. To determine whether a form of ill-treatment should be qualified as torture, the Court says it must consider the 'distinction, embodied in Article 3, between this notion and that of inhuman or degrading treatment. It appears that it was the intention that the Convention should, by means of this distinction, attach a special stigma to deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering'.¹⁰⁴ Findings that torture has been committed are rather rare. To some, this may suggest that the definition applied by the Court is still too strict. But it might also lead to the conclusion that the phenomenon has been largely eradicated, at least within Europe itself. Today, most torture cases concern acts perpetrated outside the continent, but where European States may be complicit.

Recent cases where the Court has concluded that torture was perpetrated have, with some exceptions,¹⁰⁵ tended to refer to both the severity and the purpose of the ill-treatment. In a Russian case involving a man who was wrongfully charged with a serious criminal offence, the Court accepted evidence that he had been seriously ill-treated by State agents who had the intention of extracting a confession or information. The ill-treatment was so severe that the applicant attempted suicide, resulting in a general and permanent physical disability. The Court held that torture had taken place in view of the 'severity and the purpose of the ill-treatment'.¹⁰⁶ A suspect in a murder investigation in Nizhniy Novgorod was raped by one of her interrogators, in addition to a range of ill-treatment including beatings, suffocation, and electrocution:

The Court observes that according to its settled case-law a rape of a detainee by an official of the State must be considered to be an especially grave and abhorrent form of ill-treatment given the ease with which the offender can exploit the vulnerability and weakened resistance of his victim. Furthermore, rape leaves deep psychological scars on the victims which do not respond to the passage of time as quickly as other forms of physical and mental violence. The victim also experiences the acute physical pain of forced penetration, which leaves her feeling debased and violated both physically and emotionally. In view of the above, the Court is satisfied that the accumulation of the acts of physical violence inflicted on the first applicant... and the especially cruel acts of repeated rape to which she was subjected... amounted to torture in breach of Article 3 of the Convention.¹⁰⁷

In another case, where a schoolteacher had been beaten and brutalized by police, causing serious physical pain and suffering with lasting consequences to health, the Court said 'it does not appear that the pain and suffering were inflicted on the applicant intentionally for the purpose of, for instance, making him confess to a crime or breaking his physical and moral resistance' and held the State responsible for inhuman treatment, but not torture.¹⁰⁸

With respect to various forms of abuse directed at prisoners by a special unit of correctional officers in a Russian penal colony, the Court made a finding of torture:

As noted above, the use of rubber truncheons against the applicants was retaliatory in nature. It was not, and could not be, conducive to facilitating execution of the tasks the officers were set to achieve. The gratuitous violence, to which the officers deliberately resorted, was intended to arouse in the applicants feelings of fear and humiliation and to break their physical or moral resistance. The purpose of that treatment was to debase the applicants and drive them into submission. In addition, the truncheon blows must have caused them intense mental and physical suffering, even though they did not apparently result in any long-term damage to health. In these circumstances, the Court finds that the applicants were subjected to treatment which can be described as torture.¹⁰⁹

In another Russian application, police who were investigating a murder questioned a young woman. One of the officers 'started strangling her with his hands and several other policemen started beating her. For about two hours they administered kicks and blows to her legs, threw her across the room, beat her with a baton and hit her head against the walls. While beating her they accused her of telling lies, insulted her and threatened her with rape and violence against her family'.¹¹⁰ The Court held that 'taken as a whole and having regard to its purpose and severity, the ill-treatment in issue amounted to torture'.¹¹¹

With regard to treatment of several Turkish political activists who were held for questioning by the Istanbul police, the Court said that 'taken as a whole and having regard to their purpose and duration, the acts of violence to which the applicants were subjected were particularly serious and cruel and capable of causing "severe" pain and suffering'.¹¹²

Torture as jus cogens

On several occasions the Court has described the prohibition of torture as a peremptory norm, or jus cogens.¹¹³ Such statements seem to be made to emphasize the importance of the prohibition but it does not appear that there are any legal consequences to the determination, at least within the scheme of the Convention. Indeed, some judges have expressed caution about an extensive application of the concept, warning that although 'giving absolute priority to the prohibition of torture may at first sight seem very "progressive", a more careful consideration tends to confirm that such a step would also run the risk of proving a sort of "Pyrrhic victory"'.¹¹⁴

In recent years, the International Court of Justice has referred to jus cogens norms but in a fairly summary manner, perhaps confirming the difficulty that the judges have in reaching any consensus on a more detailed discussion of the subject.¹¹⁵ A more elaborate discussion of the subject can be found in some of the individual opinions, notably those of ad hoc Judge Dugard¹¹⁶ and Judge Cançado Trindade.¹¹⁷ The most authoritative pronouncement on the subject of torture and jus cogens is the ruling of a Trial Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, in Furundžija: '[T]he prohibition on torture is a peremptory norm or jus cogens. This prohibition is so extensive that States are even barred by international law from expelling, returning or extraditing a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that the person would be in danger of being subjected to torture'.¹¹⁸

The pronouncement in Furundžija considerably expands the consequences of a finding of jus cogens from what is proposed in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. But even Furundžija is confined to the statement that the prohibition of 'torture' is a jus cogens norm, without reference to whether the same applies to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. Perhaps some of the judicial formulations have used the term 'torture' as a short form and actually intended to include 'cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'. Yet of the numerous references in case law to torture as a peremptory norm, there are none that even imply that this also pertains to the broader notion of ill-treatment. It seems reasonable to conclude that the concept of jus cogens does not apply to matters such as corporal punishment in schools, which fall within the broader rubric of ill-treatment.

'Inhuman or degrading'

Article 3 protects the individual against treatment or punishment that is 'inhuman or degrading'. The European Convention does not employ the adjective 'cruel' that is used in equivalent provisions in other international human rights instruments, including article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The reasons for the choice made by the drafters of the European Convention are obscure. It seems imprudent to attach any significance to the distinction between the European Convention formulation ('inhuman and degrading') and that of the other international instruments derived from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights ('cruel, inhuman and degrading'). It is certainly of interest to reflect on the extent to which the notion of cruelty plays a role in the interpretation of article 3 of the Convention. The term has often been used when the Court has found that the violation of article 3 should be described as torture.¹¹⁹ This might suggest that cruel treatment, as it is understood by the United Nations instruments, should be deemed torture under the European Convention.

Treatment has been held by the Court to be 'inhuman' because it was premeditated or was applied for hours at a stretch and caused either actual bodily injury or intense physical and mental suffering.¹²⁰ When torture is threatened but not imposed, as a means of obtaining information, the Grand Chamber has described such a method of interrogation as 'inhuman treatment'.¹²¹ The Court described as 'inhuman treatment' the detention conditions of a prisoner who was seriously disabled and quite ill and who was kept in a regular prison where he was forced to climb four flights of stairs in order to obtain regular haemodialysis treatments.¹²²

In assessing the application of the term 'degrading', the Court will consider whether the object of the impugned treatment or punishment was to humiliate and debase the person concerned.¹²³ Nevertheless, the absence of any such purpose or intention does not conclusively rule out a finding of a violation of article 3.¹²⁴ Treatment or punishment is also degrading if it shows a lack of respect for or diminishes the human dignity of the victim.¹²⁵ Treatment or punishment may be deemed degrading if it 'arouses feelings of fear, anguish or inferiority capable of breaking an individual's moral and physical resistance'¹²⁶ or drives persons 'to act against their will or conscience'.¹²⁷ The Court considers the consequences and whether such treatment affects adversely the personality of the applicant.¹²⁸ Where treatment does not denote 'any contempt or lack of respect for the personality of the applicants' it may not be deemed 'degrading'.¹²⁹

Sometimes both adjectives, 'inhuman' and 'degrading', will apply. In The Greek case, the European Commission said that 'all torture must be inhuman and degrading treatment, and inhuman treatment is also degrading'.¹³⁰ The so-called 'five techniques' of interrogation employed by the British in Northern Ireland were deemed to be both inhuman and degrading.¹³¹ The severe beating of Jehovah's Witnesses at the instigation of an Orthodox priest was deemed 'inhuman treatment'.¹³² In the case of some others, who were also beaten at the time but without details being provided, the Court found it 'impossible to assess whether the latter reached the level required to be classified as inhuman within the meaning of Article 3 of the Convention'.¹³³ This was also deemed 'degrading treatment', given that 'the attackers' aim was to humiliate and publicly debase the applicants in such a way as to arouse a feeling of terror and inferiority, so that, morally broken by this physical and verbal abuse, they would act against their wills and conscience and desist from holding religious meetings in line with their faith, considered unacceptable by Father Basil and his supporters'.¹³⁴

Finding that treatment is incompatible with article 3, the Court does not always specify whether this is because it is inhuman or because it is degrading. In a case concerning prison conditions in Romania, it noted the prolonged detention of the applicant in a cell of small proportions with very limited opportunity for exercise, saying that this was a violation of article 3, but without further detail.¹³⁵

'Treatment or punishment'

Frequently treatment and punishment go together, especially in the many cases that the Convention organs have considered dealing with prison conditions. However, although detainees are often being punished, pursuant to a criminal conviction, there are other forms of detention or deprivation of liberty that are not associated with punishment. As the Court has explained, 'the prohibition of ill-treatment in Article 3 applies equally to all forms of deprivation of liberty, and in particular makes no distinction according to the purpose of the measure in issue; it is immaterial whether the measure entails detention ordered in the context of criminal proceedings or admission to an institution with the aim of protecting the life or health of the person concerned'.¹³⁶ Of course, issues concerning both treatment and punishment may also arise where the alleged victim is not being detained at all. In the early case of Tyrer v. the United Kingdom, the Court said it would be 'absurd to hold that judicial punishment generally, by reason of its usual and perhaps almost inevitable element of humiliation, is "degrading" within the meaning of Article 3'.¹³⁷ Precisely for this reason, the adjectives 'inhuman' and 'degrading' imply that some further feature is required before punishment falls foul of article 3.

Although much of the European Convention on Human Rights deals with criminal justice, it is mainly concerned with matters of procedure, as well as issues of law enforcement such as arrest and detention. The Convention actually treads very gingerly when it addresses the substance of crime and punishment that lies at the core of criminal justice. For example, it generally limits its intrusion into the definitions of crimes when they have some discriminatory aspect or violate the right to private life.¹³⁸ Similarly, the European Court acknowledges that 'issues relating to just and proportionate punishment are the subject of rational debate and civilised disagreement',¹³⁹ granting States a fairly generous margin of appreciation in setting the appropriate length of sentence. As the Grand Chamber has explained, '[i]t is not the European Court's role to decide what is the appropriate term of detention applicable to a particular offence or to pronounce on the appropriate length of detention or other sentence which should be served by a person after conviction by a competent court'.¹⁴⁰

The ancient and often misunderstood maxim of lex talionis—'eye for eye, tooth for tooth'—is an early affirmation of the principle of proportionality in the punishment of crime. While it may be fair and also desirable, from a criminological perspective, that all sentences be proportionate, it might be going too far to suggest that this is a requirement imposed by article 3 of the Convention. The European Convention intervenes only when a sentence or punishment is 'grossly disproportionate'.¹⁴¹ The Court has explained that it is not its role 'to decide what is the appropriate term of detention applicable to a particular offence or to pronounce on the appropriate length of detention or other sentence which should be served by a person after conviction by a competent court'.¹⁴²

According to the Court, '[i]t is axiomatic that a prisoner cannot be detained unless there are legitimate penological grounds for that detention'.¹⁴³ It has noted the four classic grounds invoked by justice systems around the world as a justification for detention as criminal punishment: punishment, deterrence, public protection, and rehabilitation.¹⁴⁴ For the Grand Chamber, 'the emphasis in European penal policy is now on the rehabilitative aim of imprisonment'.¹⁴⁵ Explaining that the balance between the justifications is not static and may shift during the sentence, especially a lengthy one, '[i]t is only by carrying out a review of the justification for continued detention at an appropriate point in the sentence that these factors or shifts can be properly evaluated'.¹⁴⁶ Nevertheless, '[a] State's choice of a specific criminal justice system, including sentence review and release arrangements, is in principle outside the scope of the supervision the Court carries out at the European level'.¹⁴⁷ It is not for the Court to decide upon the appropriate term of detention applicable to a particular offence or to pronounce on the appropriate length of detention or other sentence that should be served by a person after conviction by a competent court.¹⁴⁸ The European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights appears to take a slightly more interventionist position on this issue, stating that '[t]he severity of penalties must not be disproportionate to the criminal offence'.¹⁴⁹

Ill-treatment may arise as a result of medical treatment, in particular if it is administered to detained persons against their will. According to the Grand Chamber, a measure that is of therapeutic necessity from the point of view of established principles of medicine cannot in principle be regarded as inhuman and degrading. Medical necessity must be demonstrated convincingly, and appropriate guarantees for the decision complied with.¹⁵⁰ But even when medical treatment appears to be voluntary, issues under article 3 may arise. The Court has held that there was a violation of article 3 in the sterilization of an unemployed Roma woman with very limited education following childbirth. The judgment explains:

[A]fter she had been in labour for several hours and was in pain, the medical personnel of Prešov Hospital had asked her whether she wanted to have more children. The applicant responded in the affirmative but was told by the medical personnel that if she had one more child, either she or the baby would die. The applicant started to cry and as she was convinced that her next pregnancy would be fatal, she told the medical personnel 'Do what you want to do'. She was then asked to sign the delivery record under the note indicating that she had requested sterilisation. The applicant did not understand the term sterilisation and she signed the form out of fear that there would otherwise be fatal consequences. As she was in the last stage of labour, her recognition and cognitive abilities were influenced by labour and pain.¹⁵¹

The Court noted that though there was no indication that medical personnel acted with an intent of ill-treatment, there was nevertheless 'gross disregard to her right to autonomy and choice as a patient'.¹⁵²

Detention

Conditions of detention obviously raise issues with respect to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Measures depriving a person of his or her liberty may often involve a breach of article 3. The State must ensure that prisoners are detained 'in conditions that are compatible with respect for their human dignity, that the manner and method of the execution of the measure do not subject them to distress or hardship of an intensity exceeding the unavoidable level of suffering inherent in detention and that, given the practical demands of imprisonment, their health and well-being are adequately secured'.¹⁵³ Prisoners must be held in conditions compatible with respect for human dignity and in such a way that the manner and method of detention does not impose distress or hardship 'of an intensity exceeding the unavoidable level of suffering inherent in detention and that, given the practical demands of imprisonment, [the detainee's] health and well-being are adequately secured by, among other things, providing him with the requisite medical assistance'.¹⁵⁴ Measures taken with respect to prisoners must also be necessary to attain a legitimate aim.¹⁵⁵ For example, the Court has examined whether extreme measures of restraint such as handcuffing or shackling of such prisoners is warranted by security concerns.¹⁵⁶ When persons are deprived of their liberty, use of physical force against them where this is not justified by their conduct in principle amounts to a violation of article 3.¹⁵⁷ In assessing whether conditions of detention are compatible with article 3, 'account has to be taken of the cumulative effects of those conditions, as well as the specific allegations made by the applicant'.¹⁵⁸

Prisoners may be restrained using handcuffs and similar techniques, particularly at the time of arrest and during appearances in the courtroom. Such measures do not normally raise an issue under article 3 'where they have been imposed in connection with lawful arrest or detention and do not entail the use of force, or public exposure, exceeding what is reasonably considered necessary in the circumstances'.¹⁵⁹ Factors to be considered are whether there is reason to think the prisoner might resist arrest or abscond, cause injury or damage, or suppress evidence.¹⁶⁰ As for the employment of metal cages in the courtroom, in some cases the Court has found its 'excessive' use to amount to degrading treatment.¹⁶¹ It has described such a measure as 'stringent' and 'humiliating'.¹⁶² In addition to the factors mentioned above, the presence of the public and media coverage of the proceedings may also be relevant.¹⁶³ After noting that the practice was commonplace in Russia, the Grand Chamber observed that:

the applicants must have had objectively justified fears that their exposure in a cage during hearings in their case would convey to their judges, who were to take decisions on the issues concerning their criminal liability and liberty, a negative image of them as being dangerous to the point of requiring such an extreme physical restraint, thus undermining the presumption of innocence. This must have caused them anxiety and distress, given the seriousness of what was at stake for them in the proceedings in question.¹⁶⁴

The Grand Chamber concluded that 'holding a person in a metal cage during a trial constitutes in itself—having regard to its objectively degrading nature which is incompatible with the standards of civilised behaviour that are the hallmark of a democratic society—an affront to human dignity in breach of Article 3'.¹⁶⁵

Where inmates require medical treatment and assistance, this must be provided at an appropriate level, failing which there is a violation of article 3.¹⁶⁶ Various factors have been deemed relevant in assessing whether article 3 is engaged, including the medical condition of the prisoner, the adequacy of medical assistance and care in detention, the advisability of maintaining the detention considering the prisoner's health,¹⁶⁷ the dynamics of the medical condition, the possibility of conditional release if health deteriorated, and the prisoner's own attitude¹⁶⁸ and potential dangerousness.¹⁶⁹ If an illness or condition is difficult to treat in prison, article 3 does not impose a general obligation to release detainees or place them in a civil hospital, but there is nonetheless a duty to protect their physical well-being. This may require, in some circumstances, remedies in the form of humanitarian measures.¹⁷⁰ The Court has declined to exclude the possibility that remedies be taken that may involve conditional release where a prisoner is seriously ill or disabled,¹⁷¹ sometimes combined with old age.¹⁷² Vulnerable detainees suffer from particular stress and uncertainty that may affect their physical and mental health and well-being.¹⁷³

Solitary confinement is one of the most serious measures that can be imposed in a prison or penitentiary.¹⁷⁴ Although removal from association with others is not desirable, the Court considers that 'the prohibition of contacts with other prisoners for security, disciplinary or protective reasons does not in itself amount to inhuman treatment or punishment'.¹⁷⁵ Nevertheless, 'complete sensory isolation, coupled with total social isolation can destroy the personality and constitutes a form of inhuman treatment which cannot be justified by the requirements of security or any other reason'.¹⁷⁶ The Court will take into account a range of factors, including the absolute or partial nature of the isolation of the prisoner, the conditions of detention while in solitary confinement, and the length of the measures in assessing whether or not there has been a breach of article 3.¹⁷⁷ Indeed, '[i]n view of the gravity of the measure, the domestic authorities are under an obligation to assess all relevant factors in an inmate's case before placing him in solitary confinement'.¹⁷⁸

Extreme punishments

Unlike 'treatment', which may be meted out or imposed in the absence of any real legal framework, 'punishment' is in principle ordained by national legislation and is to be imposed after conviction for a crime. Thus, as a preliminary, articles 6 and 7 of the Convention must be observed. There is somewhat of a tautology in the Convention to the extent that article 3 is deemed to be inapplicable to suffering or humiliation that is inherent in any particular form of legitimate punishment imposed by law.¹⁷⁹ Indeed, this is underscored by the reference in article 2 of the Convention to the most extreme punishment of all, the death penalty. As a very general rule the Convention organs have refused to sit in judgment with respect to sentencing policy in States Parties, as discussed above. However, exceptionally they have intervened with respect to so-called extreme punishments: life imprisonment, corporal punishment, and capital punishment.

Life imprisonment

Although in some European States it is not possible to sentence a person to life imprisonment, the majority still retain this option. In several jurisdictions, the likelihood that such a sentence will actually be served in full is relatively remote. Often, a sentence of life imprisonment may be imposed on adult offenders for especially serious crimes such as murder.¹⁸⁰ In a few States, it remains possible to impose an 'irreducible' life sentence by which there is no realistic prospect of release. Citing a celebrated judgment of the German Constitutional Court dealing with extreme sentences, the Grand Chamber has noted that detention with no possibility of release is contrary to human dignity.¹⁸¹ The rationale for its position was eloquently stated by Judge Power-Forde in her concurring opinion:

Those who commit the most abhorrent and egregious of acts and who inflict untold suffering upon others, nevertheless retain their fundamental humanity and carry within themselves the capacity to change. Long and deserved though their prison sentences may be, they retain the right to hope that, someday, they may have atoned for the wrongs which they have committed. They ought not to be deprived entirely of such hope. To deny them the experience of hope would be to deny a fundamental aspect of their humanity and, to do that, would be degrading.¹⁸²

Determining when a sentence is truly 'irreducible' is not always straightforward, however, and in a pre-Vinter decision that is probably no longer good law the Court did not find a violation in the case of extradition of two fugitives to the United States who were facing a sentence of 'life without parole'.¹⁸³ On a number of occasions, the Court has held that '[t]he imposition of an irreducible life sentence on an adult, without any prospect of release, may raise an issue under Article 3'. However, 'where national law affords the possibility of review of a life sentence with a view to its commutation, remission, termination or the conditional release of the prisoner, this will be sufficient'.¹⁸⁴ A life sentence does not become irreducible by the mere fact that in practice it may be served in full.¹⁸⁵ In Vinter v. The United Kingdom, the Grand Chamber said that there is no issue under article 3 if a prisoner sentenced to life is refused release because he or she is deemed to pose a danger to society. The reason for this, according to the Grand Chamber, is that States have a duty under the Convention to protect the public from violent crime. '[T]he Convention does not prohibit States from subjecting a person convicted of a serious crime to an indeterminate sentence allowing for the offender's continued detention where necessary for the protection of the public', it has said.¹⁸⁶

Preventive detention, whereby an individual is held in prison because of a risk of recidivism, raises similar issues to those of life imprisonment. Nevertheless, because remedies exist to bring it to an end, indefinite detention is not necessarily comparable to a sentence of life imprisonment.¹⁸⁷ As the sentence is by nature indefinite in duration, persons subject to such regimes are 'in particular need of psychological care and support'.¹⁸⁸ This is a necessary feature of a 'genuine attempt to reduce the risk that they will reoffend, thus serving the purpose of crime prevention and making their release possible'.¹⁸⁹

Corporal punishment

As a form of punishment prescribed by law for criminal offences, corporal punishment had no doubt virtually disappeared within the Member States of the Council of Europe even before the Convention was adopted. Vestiges of the practice remained within the United Kingdom and its subject territories; indeed, much of the very limited practice of judicial corporal punishment today can be found in former British colonies. The imposition of punishment by whipping for juveniles in 1955 by the British government in Cyprus under emergency powers was almost immediately challenged in the inter-State application filed by Greece before the European Commission of Human Rights. The Commission received evidence that 118 persons had been sentenced to be whipped, including 13 who were under 14 years of age.¹⁹⁰ The United Kingdom insisted that corporal punishment was not in itself contrary to article 3, arguing that 'all doubt on this point was removed by Article 2 of the Convention which recognised the right of the Contracting Parties to impose the death penalty. In view of this it could hardly be maintained that less extreme forms of corporal punishment than the penalty of violent death were in themselves contrary to Article 3'.¹⁹¹ The Sub-Commission of the European Commission proposed the repeal of the corporal punishment measures as a means of obtaining a friendly settlement. The Governor of Cyprus complied later the same day.¹⁹² Although the friendly settlement did not materialize, the abolition of whipping remained in force. In its report to the Committee of Ministers, the European Commission said it was not necessary to reach a legal conclusion on the compatibility of whipping with article 3 of the Convention. However, it said 'the trend of opinion today among the peoples of the Council of Europe is not sympathetic to corporal punishment as a penal sanction for young persons' and 'venture[d] to mark its satisfaction at the fact that this measure was revoked'.¹⁹³

One of the first article 3 cases to come before the Court concerned the administration of corporal punishment within the juvenile justice system of the Isle of Man, which is subject to the Convention as a self-governing dependency of the United Kingdom. Holding that there had been a violation of article 3, the Court said:

The very nature of judicial corporal punishment is that it involves one human being inflicting physical violence on another human being. Furthermore, it is institutionalised violence that is in the present case violence permitted by the law, ordered by the judicial authorities of the State and carried out by the police authorities of the State . . . Thus, although the applicant did not suffer any severe or long-lasting physical effects, his punishment—whereby he was treated as an object in the power of the authorities—constituted an assault on precisely that which it is one of the main purposes of Article 3 (art. 3) to protect, namely a person's dignity and physical integrity.¹⁹⁴

Judicial corporal punishment appears to have virtually disappeared from the territory of the Council of Europe. There has been some evidence of its imposition in a disciplinary or reprisal context within Russian prisons.¹⁹⁵ Issues may nevertheless arise in cases of refoulement to one of the remaining States on the planet where it is still practiced.¹⁹⁶

Corporal punishment has remained present within national legislation as a form of justification or excuse that may be raised, under precise circumstances, by parents or schoolteachers charged with assault for imposition of disciplinary corporal punishment. Article 3 also applies to school discipline in relations among pupils.¹⁹⁷ In a case involving discipline of a seven-year-old by 'slippering' ('three "whacks" on the bottom through his shorts with a rubber-soled gym shoe'), the Court considered that the level of ill-treatment was far less than that in the Tyrer case and concluded that there was no violation of article 3.¹⁹⁸ However, in the case of a nine-year-old who was beaten by his stepfather with a garden cane applied with considerable force on more than one occasion, leaving bruises on various parts of the body, the government itself conceded that article 3 had been violated. The perpetrator had been acquitted of assault after invoking 'reasonable chastisement', a defence that is available to parents and others who are in loco parentis under English law. Finding that article 3 had been violated, the Court noted that 'the Government have accepted that this law currently fails to provide adequate protection to children and should be amended'.¹⁹⁹ In an Issue Paper published in 2009, the Council of Europe Commissioner of Human Rights noted that the execution of the judgment in that case was still being supervised, given that the United Kingdom had amended its legislation but had not removed the defence of 'reasonable chastisement'.²⁰⁰ In litigation under articles 8 and 9, the Convention organs have held that legislation prohibiting all corporal punishment of children, even by parents, does not breach the right to family life or freedom of religion.²⁰¹

Capital punishment

The issue of capital punishment highlights the intriguing relationship between articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. The two provisions have always been closely related in the case law of the Court as they are both components of the basic values respected by democratic societies.²⁰² When the death penalty is concerned, there is an obvious tension—the European Commission spoke of a ‘certain disharmony’²⁰³—because article 2(1) of the Convention authorizes the State to impose such a sanction yet article 3 prohibits any punishment that is inhuman or degrading. Until very recently, both the Commission and the Court took the view that the death penalty cannot not per se be viewed as contrary to article 3.²⁰⁴ According to the Court, article 3 ‘evidently cannot have been intended by the drafters of the Convention to include a general prohibition of the death penalty since that would nullify the clear wording of Article 2 § 1’.²⁰⁵ The Court acknowledged that subsequent State practice could indicate an agreement that capital punishment was no longer permitted by the Convention. It referred to the adoption of Protocol No. 6, noting this was the ‘normal method of amendment’ of the Convention. Protocol No. 6 was an ‘optional instrument allowing each State to choose the moment when to undertake such an engagement’. Consequently, article 3 ‘cannot be interpreted as generally prohibiting the death penalty’.²⁰⁶

That conclusion did not exclude the possibility of violations associated with execution, such as the intolerably long period of detention prior to execution in some jurisdictions. In one of its most significant and influential judgments, the Court ruled that the ‘death row phenomenon’ constituted a breach of article 3 because of the suffering and anguish of the condemned person while awaiting execution. Under the circumstances, the expected delay between conviction and execution was eight years, although there were other aggravating factors such as the relatively young age of the applicant.²⁰⁷

Eventually, in 2010, the Court concluded that developments within the Council of Europe entitled it to disregard the terms of article 2(1) to the extent that they authorized the use of the death penalty. The case concerned applicants who were handed over by occupying British forces to Iraqi authorities. If convicted, they could face the death penalty. The Court resisted finding that there was a violation of the right to life set out in article 2 and instead shifted the analysis to article 3. It said that ‘the applicants’ well-founded fear of being executed by the Iraqi authorities during the period May 2006 to July 2009 must have given rise to a significant degree of mental suffering and that to subject them to such suffering constituted inhuman treatment within the meaning of Article 3 of the Convention’.²⁰⁸ In effect, it returned to the spirit of its death row phenomenon jurisprudence by condemning the mental anguish associated with imposition of a death sentence rather than declaring it to be inhuman or degrading regardless of the degree of pre-execution suffering experienced by the victim. The same understanding emerges from the Court's most recent pronouncement, in Al Nashiri v. Poland, condemning resort to capital punishment because 'the foreknowledge of death at the hands of the State must inevitably give rise to intense psychological suffering'.²⁰⁹

Positive obligations

Article 3 has mainly been applied where the risk to the individual of a violation emanates from intentional acts inflicted by State agents or public authorities.²¹⁰ It therefore imposes 'a primarily negative obligation' on the State to refrain from inflicting serious harm.²¹¹ Nevertheless, there is a positive dimension to the right requiring the State to take action to prevent torture and inhuman or degrading treatment being inflicted by persons not acting on behalf of the State.²¹² The positive obligations are also associated with article 1 of the Convention. An important part of the positive obligations consists of what has been called the 'procedural obligation', a concept that also exists with respect to article 2 of the Convention.

Positive obligations requiring the State to provide protection against inhuman or degrading treatment have been recognized in a broad range of cases, such as corporal punishment of a child by a stepfather,²¹³ and the protection of children severely abused and neglected by their parents.²¹⁴ Positive obligations may also arise where the consequences of a naturally occurring illness may be exacerbated by treatment stemming from measures for which the authorities can be held responsible, although the threshold may be high because the harm results from the illness rather than the acts or omissions of the authorities.²¹⁵

As with article 2 of the Convention, the Court has developed a 'procedural obligation' contained within article 3, assisted by article 1, by which the State is required to investigate and prosecute cases of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.²¹⁶ This aspect of article 3 applies not only when there is an allegation of ill-treatment by the police or other agents of the State, but also when the acts themselves cannot be imputed to the State at all.²¹⁷ The authorities must investigate allegations of ill-treatment when they are 'arguable' and 'raise a reasonable suspicion'.²¹⁸

An effective criminal justice system that addresses physical attacks on the bodily integrity of citizens is one important manifestation of the positive obligations associated with article 3. Of course, it is an obligation of means, and the State cannot be held responsible simply because inhuman or degrading treatment is inflicted by one individual on another or, if it is, that criminal proceedings necessarily lead to a particular sanction. For there to be a violation of the Convention, 'it must in the view of the Court be shown that the domestic legal system, and in particular the criminal law applicable in the circumstances of the case, fails to provide practical and effective protection of the rights guaranteed by Article 3'.²¹⁹ The Court has insisted that 'the obligation on the State to bring to justice perpetrators of acts contrary to Article 3 of the Convention serves mainly to ensure that acts of ill-treatment do not remain ignored by the relevant authorities and to provide effective protection against acts of ill-treatment'.²²⁰ But the Court has also suggested that the purpose of criminal prosecution is specific deterrence of the offender and, thereby, protection of the victim against violence.²²¹ Criminal justice may not necessarily be the appropriate remedy.²²² Moreover, it may be unavailable because the perpetrators of the acts are not subject to prosecution, for example because of their young age.²²³

All states will have measures in place within their criminal justice systems to deal with various forms of assault, including sexual assault. Where the provisions of the criminal justice legislation or prosecutorial policy applied by the authorities reflect outdated stereotypes that contribute to impunity, there may be a breach of article 3. For example, in a Bulgarian case the Court held that the insistence upon evidence of physical resistance by the victim of a sexual assault was incompatible with the prohibitions enshrined in article 3.²²⁴ Domestic violence raises special issues with respect to the procedural obligation comprised within article 3.²²⁵ The Court has explained that it is 'a general problem which concerns all member States and which does not always surface since it often takes place within personal relationships or closed circuits and it is not only women who are affected'.²²⁶ In applying the Convention, the Court will bear in mind specialized international instruments applicable to the problem, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the Inter-American Convention on the Prevention, Punishment, and Eradication of Violence against Women.²²⁷

Where there are suspicions that racist attitudes may be involved in violent attacks, the authorities also must address this aspect in their investigation.²²⁸ The Court has noted that making special provision for violent crimes that are racially motivated is consistent with obligations under international law, including the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.²²⁹

An official investigation required by article 3 must be capable of leading to the identification of those responsible. Otherwise, the Court has held, 'the general legal prohibition of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment would, despite its fundamental importance, be ineffective in practice and it would be possible in some cases for agents of the State to abuse the rights of those within their control with virtual impunity'.²³⁰ A thorough investigation requires that all reasonable steps be taken to secure eyewitness and forensic evidence,²³¹ that it be expeditious,²³² and that it be conducted by persons who have sufficient independence.²³³ It is an obligation of means and not of result; the failure to reach a conclusive result does not mean that the procedural obligation has not been respected.²³⁴ The procedural obligation will arise when there is a failure to conduct an inquiry into injuries suffered by inmates at the hands of the security forces following a prison riot.²³⁵ Often, when the State is not ostensibly involved, there may be a strong suspicion that its failure to intervene or to investigate and prosecute amounts to tolerance and even collusion in illegal acts.

The State's procedural obligation was first developed within international human rights law by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in cases dealing with enforced disappearance. The relatives of missing persons are themselves potential victims of the violation of article 3 to the extent that they are 'kept in ignorance of the fate of their loved ones and suffer the anguish of uncertainty'. This form of secondary victimization might also arise where parents are helpless onlookers while their children are treated in a degrading and inhumane manner.²³⁶ According to the European Court, in disappearance cases the 'essence of the violation is not that there has been a serious human rights violation concerning the missing person; it lies in the authorities' reactions and attitudes to the situation when it has been brought to their attention'.²³⁷ The violation may occur not only in circumstances where the State itself is responsible for the disappearance, but also where it is the act of third parties and 'where the failure of the authorities to respond to the quest for information by the relatives or the obstacles placed in their way, leaving them to bear the brunt of the efforts to uncover any facts, may be regarded as disclosing a flagrant, continuous and callous disregard of an obligation to account for the whereabouts and fate of a missing person'.²³⁸

The procedural obligation is related to the need to deter violations of the Convention. Robust prosecution through criminal law may be required, particularly in cases of wilful ill-treatment by State agents. The Court has held that '[i]f the authorities could confine their reaction to incidents of intentional police ill-treatment to the mere payment of compensation, while remaining passive in the prosecution of those responsible, it would be possible in some cases for agents of the State to abuse the rights of those within their control with virtual impunity and the general legal prohibition of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment, despite its fundamental importance, would be ineffective in practice'.²³⁹ The Court 'must retain its supervisory function and intervene in cases of manifest disproportion between the gravity of the act and the punishment imposed'.²⁴⁰ This is because 'punishment, which is manifestly disproportionate to a breach of one of the core rights of the Convention, does not have the necessary deterrent effect in order to prevent further violations of the prohibition of ill-treatment in future difficult situations'.²⁴¹

Extraterritorial application

The expulsion or refoulement of persons from States Parties often raise issues with respect to article 3 of the Convention. This is a special application of the general principles governing extraterritorial application of the Convention, discussed in this Commentary in the chapter on article 1. The Court has framed its discussion by noting that States are entitled, as a matter of international law and subject to their treaty obligations, to control the entry, residence, and expulsion of aliens.²⁴² Nor is there any right to political asylum under the Convention.²⁴³ Where 'substantial grounds have been shown for believing that the person concerned, if deported, faces a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3', the Convention requires that the victim not be removed to the country in question.²⁴⁴ In a case involving the transfer of asylum seekers from Switzerland to Italy pursuant to the Dublin Agreement, the Grand Chamber concluded that 'were the applicants to be returned to Italy without the Swiss authorities having first obtained individual guarantees from the Italian authorities that the applicants would be taken charge of in a manner adapted to the age of the children and that the family would be kept together, there would be a violation of Article 3 of the Convention'.²⁴⁵ The Court will assess the conditions in the receiving country in light of the standards imposed by article 3.²⁴⁶

In refoulement cases, the European Court has generally avoided pronouncing itself on the distinction between torture and ill-treatment.²⁴⁷ Its explanation is that 'in the extra-territorial context, a prospective assessment is required [and] it is not always possible to determine whether the ill-treatment which may ensue in the receiving State will be sufficiently severe as to qualify as torture'.²⁴⁸

Assessment of the risk depends upon all of the circumstances.²⁴⁹ It must be rigorous, a heavy burden being placed upon the applicant to demonstrate the real risk of ill-treatment to adduce 'substantial grounds'.²⁵⁰ At the same time, because of the special circumstances in which asylum seekers may find themselves, the Court has said they must frequently be given 'the benefit of the doubt when it comes to assessing the credibility of their statements and the documents submitted in support thereof'.²⁵¹ On the other hand, when there is information that 'gives strong reasons to question the veracity of an asylum seeker's submissions, the individual must provide a satisfactory explanation for the alleged discrepancies'.²⁵²

If the risk emanates from non-State actors, the receiving State must ensure appropriate protection to protect the potential victim.²⁵³ The assessment of risk focuses on the foreseeable consequences of removal, in light of the general situation in the receiving State as well as the person circumstances of the applicant.²⁵⁴ However, a general situation of violence in the receiving State does not normally lead to the conclusion that there is a real risk of a violation of article 3.²⁵⁵ Although the Court has not excluded the possibility that a general situation of violence in a country of destination will be of a sufficient level of intensity, 'the Court would adopt such an approach only in the most extreme cases of general violence, where there was a real risk of ill-treatment simply by virtue of an individual being exposed to such violence on return'.²⁵⁶

In response to allegations that expulsion will entail a violation of article 3, respondent States have sometimes proffered 'diplomatic assurances'. These are undertakings made by the receiving State about treatment to be received if the person is transferred. In death penalty cases, for example, it has been common for such diplomatic undertakings to be provided. These have generally been regarded by the Convention organs to be satisfactory.²⁵⁷ The death penalty will be governed by legal provisions making it relatively straightforward to assess the binding nature of any assurances. The situation is quite different when assurances involve torture, an act that is in principle prohibited by law in the receiving State. In Saadi v. Italy, the respondent State Party invoked assurances it had been given by Tunisia. They had been requested in the most civil and obtuse language, given the diplomatic challenge involved in asking a State to guarantee that it will not commit an international crime. The response given to Italy, that its authorities judged to be satisfactory, read as follows: 'The Minister of Foreign Affairs hereby confirms that the Tunisian laws in force guarantee and protect the rights of prisoners in Tunisia and secure to them the right to a fair trial. The Minister would point out that Tunisia has voluntarily acceded to the relevant international treaties and conventions.'²⁵⁸ The Court was not impressed with such assurances but it added that even if they were satisfactory this would not be sufficient given the requirement that it make its own assessment. It did not rule out the significance of diplomatic assurances in such cases, but said '[t]he weight to be given to assurances from the receiving State depends, in each case, on the circumstances prevailing at the material time'.²⁵⁹

Discrimination

Both the Court and the Commission have taken the view that discrimination may in and of itself constitute inhumane treatment in breach of article 3 of the Convention where it attains a sufficient level of severity.²⁶⁰ Referring approvingly to an early case of the Commission, the Court has said, 'with respect to an allegation of racial discrimination, that a special importance should be attached to discrimination based on race and that publicly to single out a group of persons for differential treatment on the basis of race might, in certain circumstances, constitute a special affront to human dignity'.²⁶¹ The presence of racial discrimination may also be deemed an aggravating factor to be considered in assessing whether ill-treatment meets the threshold of seriousness required for the application of article 3.²⁶²

Article 14 of the Convention provides the basis for a distinct assessment of the role of prohibited discrimination in violations of article 3. Article 14 is complementary to the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. It has no independent existence, applying only with respect to other protected rights and freedoms. The Court found that article 14 had been breached in conjunction with article 3 in a case involving persecution of Jehovah's Witnesses in Georgia. Although much of the conduct was imputable to another religious organization, the Court recognized that several acts involved the direct participation of police and other authorities. Victims were subjected to religious insults when lodging complaints with the police and, more generally, 'there was a systematic practice on the part of the Georgian authorities of tolerating religious violence against Jehovah's Witnesses'.²⁶³ The Court said the applicants had made a prima facie case that religious hatred had played a principal role in the way they had been treated by the State authorities, and that the State had failed to provide any satisfactory explanation or response.²⁶⁴ The Court concluded first that 'the various forms of violence directed against the applicants either by State agents or private individuals were instigated by a bigoted attitude towards the community of Jehovah's Witnesses and, secondly, that the very same discriminatory state of mind was at the core of the relevant public authorities' failure to investigate the incidents of religiously motivated violence in an effective manner, which confirmed that the authorities at least tolerated that violence'.²⁶⁵

Racism was also found to have played a role in the ill-treatment of Chechens by Russian law enforcement authorities during residential searches. The applicants reported on various forms of physical brutality associated with abusive remarks about their ethnicity. The Court insisted that 'where evidence comes to light of racist verbal abuse being uttered by law-enforcement agents in the context of the alleged ill-treatment of detained persons from an ethnic or other minority, a thorough examination of all the facts should be undertaken in order to discover any possible racial motives'.²⁶⁶ Observing that the applications had made a prima facie case of racially based ill-treatment and that the Government had offered no satisfactory explanation, the Court concluded that the conduct of the authorities 'constituted discrimination based on ethnicity, which is a form of racial discrimination'.²⁶⁷ This was held to be a violation of article 14 taken together with both the substantive and procedural aspects of article 3.

Several cases have involved violence directed against vulnerable groups based upon race, religion, or other grounds where the complicity of the State was not alleged but where it was accused of failing to fulfil adequately its 'procedural obligation'. Even when complaints are investigated by the authorities, the Convention requires that if there is a discriminatory dimension this must feature as part of the inquiry. The combined effect of articles 3 and 14 requires that appropriate attention be directed to the role of racism and other prohibited forms of discrimination, because '[t]raiter la violence et les brutalités à motivation raciste sur un pied d'égalité avec les affaires sans connotation raciste équivaudrait à fermer les yeux sur la nature spécifique d'actes particulièrement destructeurs des droits fondamentaux'.²⁶⁸ In effect, 'an obligation to unmask a possible discriminatory motive behind violent incidents is implied in the responsibilities under Article 14 of the Convention'.²⁶⁹ The reason for this is that '[r]acial violence is a particular affront to human dignity and, in view of its dangerous consequences, requires special vigilance and a vigorous reaction from the authorities. It is for this reason that the authorities must use all available means to combat racism and racist violence, thereby reinforcing democracy's vision of a society in which diversity is not perceived as a threat but as a source of its enrichment'.²⁷⁰ assault. Moreover, the two perpetrators were identified in the police file as being skinheads known for their extremist ideology. There was a failure to pursue the thesis that racist motives were responsible.²⁷¹ The Court said there was a violation of the procedural aspect of article 3 taken on its own and in combination with article 14 of the Convention.²⁷² In such cases, the Court has spoken of 'the interplay of the two provisions', explaining that such matters may be examined under one or the other provision or under both, something to be decided in each case on its facts and depending on the nature of the allegations.²⁷³

Gender discrimination, especially in the context of domestic violence, has resulted in similar case law with respect to the procedural obligation contained within article 3. In a case involving violence against women, where 'the general and discriminatory judicial passivity in Turkey [to domestic violence against women] created a climate that was conducive to domestic violence' and contributed to violence within the family, the Court said this was a violation of article 14 taken in conjunction with article 3.²⁷⁴ In cases from Moldova, the Court has cited a number of factors that it said amounted to condoning of domestic violence and therefore discriminatory treatment based upon gender.²⁷⁵

Where homosexuals were discharged from the armed forces, the Court said that it 'would not exclude that treatment which is grounded upon a predisposed bias on the part of a heterosexual majority against a homosexual minority of the nature described above could, in principle, fall within the scope of Article 3'.²⁷⁶

The Court has said that article 4 enshrines 'one of the fundamental values of democratic societies'.¹ Slavery has been practised since antiquity and was often enshrined within the national legal order. Hugo Grotius wrote favourably about the phenomenon.² He was attacked by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, who explained: 'Dire qu'un homme se donne gratuitement, c'est dire une chose absurde et inconcevable; un tel acte est illégitime et nul, par cels eule que celui qui le fait n'est pas dans son bon sens. Dire la même-chose de tout un peuple, c'est supposer un peuple de foux: la folie ne fait pas droit.'³

The slave trade was prohibited by the British Parliament only in 1807, although the practice persisted in most of the Empire until 1833. France abolished slavery and the slave trade at the time of the Revolution. It was subsequently restored, and only definitively ended in 1848. Russia continued the related practice of serfdom until 1861. Slavery was abolished a few years later in the United States of America.

Slavery returned to Europe during the 1940s, practised by the Nazi regime during the Second World War. The International Military Tribunal said that the Nazi government planned 'to exploit the inhabitants of the occupied countries for slave labour on the very greatest scale', considering that slave labour was 'an integral part of the war economy'. According to the judgment, '[w]hole populations were deported to Germany for the purposes of slave labour upon defence works, armament production and similar tasks connected with the war effort'.⁴ An estimated 5 million people were moved by force to Germany to work as slaves in this way.⁵ Leading Nazis were condemned for the crime against humanity of enslavement in accordance with article 6(c) of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal and article II(1)(c) of Control Council Law No. 10.⁶

International law first addressed the matter comprehensively in the 1926 Slavery Convention.⁷ It was followed by the International Labour Organisation Forced Labour Convention, adopted in 1930.⁸ Article 4 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights states: 'No one shall be held in slavery or servitude; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms.'

The European Charter of Fundamental Rights declares:

1. No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.
2. No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour.
3. Trafficking in human beings is prohibited.

The first two paragraphs of article 5 of the Charter are identical to the first two paragraphs of article 4 of the Convention and are meant to have the same meaning and scope.⁹

The barbaric phenomenon of chattel slavery is probably relegated to history, although there continue to be reports that it persists in Mauritania.¹⁰ The legacy of the African slave trade manifests itself in on-going claims, including litigation before various national courts, for forms of reparation and compensation. Within the present-day human rights movement, the prohibition mainly concerns what are called contemporary forms of slavery. These include debt bondage, human trafficking, domestic slavery, forced prostitution, and similar practices.¹¹ According to a Recommendation by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, adopted in 2004:

1. The Parliamentary Assembly is dismayed that slavery continues to exist in Europe in the twenty-first century. Although, officially, slavery was abolished over 150 years ago, thousands of people are still held as slaves in Europe, treated as objects, humiliated and abused. Modern slaves, like their counterparts of old, are forced to work (through mental or physical threat) with no or little financial reward. They are physically constrained or have other limits placed on their freedom of movement and are treated in a degrading and inhumane manner.

2. Today's slaves are predominantly female and usually work in private households, starting out as migrant domestic workers, au pairs or 'mail-order brides'. Most have come voluntarily, seeking to improve their situation or escaping poverty and hardship, but some have been deceived by their employers, agencies or other intermediaries, have been debt-bonded and even trafficked. Once working (or married to a 'consumer husband'), however, they are vulnerable and isolated. This creates ample opportunity for abusive employers or husbands to force them into domestic slavery.¹²

The Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings was adopted in 2005 and entered into force in 2008. It enjoys near-universal acceptance by Council of Europe States. The Convention's Preamble states that 'trafficking in human beings may result in slavery for victims'.¹³

The initial draft European Convention on Human Rights, adopted by the International Council of the European Movement in 1949, contained the following: 'Every State a party to this Convention shall guarantee to all persons within its territory the following rights: ... c) Freedom from slavery and servitude and from compulsory labour of a discriminatory kind.'¹⁴ At the first session of the Consultative Assembly, Pierre-Henri Teitgen called for adoption of a convention that would recognize 'freedom from slavery and servitude'.¹⁵ Asked to prepare a text for discussion in the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions, Teitgen proposed the following: 'Exemption from slavery and servitude, as laid down in Article 4 of the United Nations Declaration.'¹⁶ At its sitting of 29 August 1949, the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions accepted inclusion of '[e]xemption from any slavery or servitude as laid down in Article 4 of the Declaration of the United Nations.'¹⁷ The word 'any' was changed to 'all' in the English language version of the draft report adopted by the Committee¹⁸ and then omitted altogether in the final report submitted to the Consultative Assembly: 'Exemption from slavery or servitude, in accordance with Article 4 of the United Nations Declaration.¹⁹ The text proposed by the Committee was adopted without debate by the Consultative Assembly.²⁰

In the Committee of Experts, the United Kingdom proposed a somewhat more detailed text that was based on the current draft of the corresponding provision in the United Nations Covenant:

- 1) No one shall be held in slavery; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms.
- 2) No one shall be held in servitude.
- 3) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour except pursuant to a sentence to such punishment for a crime by a competent court.²¹

At the second session of the Committee of Experts, in March 1950, the United Kingdom representative submitted a more elaborate proposal:

- 1) No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.
- 2) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour.
- 3) For the purpose of this article, the term 'forced or compulsory labour' shall not include:
 - a) any work required to be done in the ordinary course of detention imposed by the lawful order of a court;
 - b) any service of a military character or service in the case of conscientious objectors exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws;
 - c) any service exacted in case of an emergency or calamity threatening the life or well-being of the community;
 - d) any work or service which forms part of normal civil obligations.²²

The Committee of Experts concluded its work with the submission to the Committee of Ministers of two different drafts. The first, 'Alternatives A and A/2', consisted of the text adopted by the Committee of Experts at its first session, taken verbatim from article 4 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.²³ The second, labelled 'Alternatives B and B/2', contained the text that had been proposed by the United Kingdom, with two minor alterations.²⁴

The Conference of Senior Officials that convened in June 1950 assigned a Drafting Committee to attempt to reconcile the competing versions. It prepared a new formulation of the prohibition of slavery and servitude based largely on the British proposal, with a few very minor stylistic changes, as well as one of substance: the suggestion that the issue of conscientious objection only arose in countries where it was recognized.

- 1) No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.
- 2) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour.
- 3) For the purposes of this article, the term 'forced or compulsory labour' shall not include:
 - a) any work required to be done in the ordinary course of detention imposed by a lawful order of a court;
 - b) any service of a military character or, in case of conscientious objectors in countries where they are recognised, service exacted instead of compulsory military service laws;
 - c) any service exacted in case of an emergency or calamity threatening the life or well-being of the community;
 - d) any work or service which forms part of normal civil obligations.²⁵

The Drafting Committee undertook one further change with the replacement, in paragraph 3(a), of the words 'by a lawful order of a court' with 'according to the provisions of article 5 hereof'.²⁶ Article 5 was the draft provision concerning arbitrary detention, just as it is in the final version of the Convention.

At the fifth session of the Committee of Ministers, in early August 1950, the Netherlands proposed a series of amendments, including the following comment: 'It is assumed that article 4 does not apply to labour imposed upon a prisoner in case of conditional release.'²⁷ The Committee of Ministers modified paragraph 3(a) of article 4, replacing the words 'by a lawful order of a court' with 'according to the provisions of Article 5 of this Convention or during conditional release from such detention'.²⁸ With this change accepted, the Committee of Ministers adopted the revised text of article 2. There were no further modifications and the version confirmed at the fifth session of the Committee of Ministers is the definitive one.

The heading 'Prohibition of Slavery and Forced Labour' was added pursuant to the provisions of Protocol No. 11.²⁹

Analysis and interpretation

Article 4 consists of three paragraphs, the third of which has four sub-paragraphs.

Paragraph 1 states the general principle: 'No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.' The text is identical to the first phrase in article 4 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, although the latter provision is completed with the words 'slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms'. As has been noted by the Court, '[u]nlike most of the substantive clauses of the Convention and of Protocols Nos. 1 and 4, Article 4 makes no provision for exceptions and no derogation from it is permissible under Article 15 § 2 even in the event of a public emergency threatening the life of the nation'.³⁰ Paragraph 2 addresses the distinct phenomenon of forced or compulsory labour: 'No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour.' It is completed by paragraph 3, whose very detailed provisions explain in a negative sense the scope of the notion of forced or compulsory labour.

Perhaps more than any other provision of the Convention, article 4 is essentially about positive, rather than negative, obligations. The nature and scope of this obligation is very similar to what the Court has held with respect to articles 2 and 3,³¹ and for the same reasons. But in the case of slavery and servitude, much more than that of killing and torture, in modern times the perpetrator will not be the State, but rather individuals. There are several components to the positive obligation.

There is an obligation on the State to take operational measures to protect victims, or potential victims, of treatment in breach of article 4.³² It arises where 'State authorities were aware, or ought to have been aware that an identified individual had been, or was at real and immediate risk of being subjected to such treatment.' In such cases, the State must then take appropriate measures within its powers to address the situation of the victim.³³ The judgments include a standard paragraph, identical to one used in cases involving the positive obligations of articles 2 and 3: 'Bearing in mind the difficulties involved in policing modern societies and the operational choices which must be made in terms of priorities and resources, the obligation to take operational measures must, however, be interpreted in a way which does not impose an impossible or disproportionate burden on the authorities.'³⁴ It has not been decided whether article 4 can be applied to corporate bodies as well as natural persons.³⁵

As with articles 2 and 3, there is a procedural obligation associated with article 4. Where there is a 'credible suspicion'³⁶ that rights under article 4 have been violated, the State must ensure that there is a prompt, effective and independent investigation, regardless of whether there is a complaint from the victim or next-of-kin. Generally, the 'credible suspicion' will result from a complaint by the victim. In the absence of a complaint, the Court may be inclined to relieve the State of a finding that it was in breach of its obligations.³⁷ The investigation must be capable of leading to identification and punishment of those who are responsible, although this is an obligation of means rather than of result. The victim or the next-of-kin must be involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard their legitimate interests.³⁸

In order to complete the procedural dimension of the obligation, States must penalize and prosecute any act that is aimed at maintaining a person in a situation of slavery, servitude, or forced or compulsory labour.³⁹ This requires the existence of an effective legislative and administrative framework.⁴⁰ Other consequences of the obligation include the adoption of adequate measures to regulate businesses that are typically used to front or cover for human trafficking. Immigration rules must address issues of encouragement, facilitation, or tolerance of trafficking.⁴¹ Officials in the system must receive appropriate training about the phenomenon.⁴² For example, in Cyprus, the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights had noted in a 2004 report that the lack of an immigration policy and related shortcomings 'encouraged the trafficking of women to Cyprus'.⁴³ The Cypriot regime of 'artiste visas' was being exploited as a vehicle to traffic for purposes of prostitution.⁴⁴ Even the government had admitted that the number of young women migrating to Cyprus as nightclub performers was well out of proportion to the country's population.⁴⁵

Violations of article 4 will frequently have a transnational dimension. As the Court noted in Rantsev, when trafficking takes place there may be offences in the State of origin, the State of transit, and the State of destination, and relevant evidence and witnesses may be located in several jurisdictions. It insisted that in cross-border trafficking cases the Convention imposes an obligation 'to cooperate effectively with the relevant authorities of other States concerned in the investigation of events which occurred outside their territories'.⁴⁶

Slavery and servitude (art. 4(1))

Slavery is defined in the 1926 Slavery Convention as 'the status or condition of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised'.⁴⁷ This definition is widely considered to be authoritative, and has been endorsed by the Court for the purposes of the application of article 4.⁴⁸ The Court described this as the 'classic' meaning of slavery as it was practised for centuries. Servitude is distinguished from slavery in that it does not involve the notion of ownership. It consists of an obligation to provide services that is imposed by coercion.⁴⁹ The European Commission on Human Rights described servitude as a 'particularly serious form of denial of freedom'.⁵⁰ It said that 'in addition to the obligation to perform certain services for others . . . the obligation for the "serf" to live on another person's property and the impossibility of altering his condition'.⁵¹ For the Court, la servitude constitue une qualification spéciale du travail forcé ou obligatoire ou, en d'autres termes, un travail forcé ou obligatoire «aggravé». En l'occurrence, l'élément fondamental qui distingue la servitude du travail forcé ou obligatoire, au sens de l'article 4 de la Convention, consiste dans le sentiment des victimes que leur condition est immuable et que la situation n'est pas susceptible d'évoluer. A cet égard, il suffit que ce sentiment repose sur des éléments objectifs suscités ou entretenus par les auteurs des agissements.⁵²

Abolished in Europe over the course of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, slavery is not a genuine problem likely to be litigated before the Court, and there have been no findings of violation of this part of article 4. In Siliadin v. France, the Court considered the application of the concept of slavery to the circumstances of a young African woman who worked as a domestic servant every day for many years without any real rest or leisure. 'Although the applicant was, in the instant case, clearly deprived of her personal autonomy, the evidence does not suggest that she was held in slavery in the proper sense, in other words that Mr and Mrs B. exercised a genuine right of legal ownership over her, thus reducing her to the status of an "object"', said the judgment.⁵³ Given the young age when she was sent to work, the harsh conditions of her work, the fact a promise she would be educated was not honoured, and her identity papers confiscated, the Court considered the circumstances to amount to servitude within the scope of article 4.⁵⁴

The Court also considered the application of the term 'slavery' to the case of a Roma girl who was allegedly sold to criminals in Italy, although she had been through a form of marriage. It said there was not sufficient evidence to support the claim of slavery. Even assuming that a sum of money changed hands at the time of the 'marriage', the Court said 'such a monetary contribution cannot be considered to amount to a price attached to the transfer of ownership, which would bring into play the concept of slavery'. The Court said 'marriage has deep-rooted social and cultural connotations which may differ largely from one society to another', and the transfer of money on such an occasion 'can reasonably be accepted as representing a gift from one family to another, a tradition common to many different cultures in today's society'.⁵⁵

The Court recognized a situation of servitude in a case concerning two sisters from Burundi who had been sent to Paris to live with relatives when they were still minor children. There, they were subject to various forms of abuse, and were housed in deplorable conditions, and this led to criminal proceedings. One of the sisters was kept in the home, where she performed a range of domestic work and was denied public education, while the other attended school. The Court distinguished between the two situations. The woman who remained at home believed her status in France depended upon residing with the family, and that she could not leave without jeopardizing her right to remain in the country. Because she was not educated, she had no hope of working outside the home. She did not have any day of rest, no leisure or recreation, and no possibility of developing contacts outside the house whom she could then call upon for help. 'Ainsi, la Cour considère que la première requérante avait le sentiment que sa condition, à savoir le fait d'effectuer un travail forcé ou obligatoire au domicile des époux

M., ne pouvait pas évoluer et que cette condition était immuable, d'autant plus qu'elle a duré quatre années', the Court wrote, concluding that this was a situation of servitude.⁵⁶ On the other hand, the other sister was less isolated, attending school, where she had good results, and where the opportunity to continue life outside the home of the relatives was more plausible. As a result, she was not deemed to be in servitude.⁵⁷

Human trafficking

The term 'trafficking' does not appear in the European Convention, although it is used in several of the more modern international legal instruments, notably the 2000 Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children ('the Palermo Protocol') and the 2005 Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings. The Court has explained that the absence of an express reference to trafficking is unsurprising given that the Convention was inspired by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which itself makes no reference to the term.⁵⁸ According to the Court, trafficking in human beings as a global phenomenon has increased significantly. Its growth in Europe was 'facilitated in part by the collapse of former Communist blocs'.⁵⁹ In Rantsev, the Chamber noted that another Chamber of the Court had already addressed trafficking under the rubric of servitude, in Siliadin, but it said: 'In light of the proliferation of both trafficking itself and of measures taken to combat it, the Court considers it appropriate in the present case to examine the extent to which trafficking itself may be considered to run counter to the spirit and purpose of Article 4 of the Convention such as to fall within the scope of the guarantees offered by that Article without the need to assess which of the three types of proscribed conduct are engaged by the particular treatment in the case in question.'⁶⁰ Another Chamber has taken note of the two approaches, but without adopting a firm position.⁶¹ Examining the same issue, a Chamber considered that the situation it was examining was closer to that of Siliadin than Rantsev, and preferred to remain within the enumerated categories of article 4, that is, forced labour and servitude.⁶²

The Council of Europe Convention provides a definition of trafficking that demonstrates its close relationship to the subject matter of article 4 of the European Convention on Human Rights:

Trafficking in human beings shall mean the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs.⁶³

⁶³ Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings, ETS 197, art. 4(a).

A similar definition is found in article 3 of the Palermo Protocol.⁶⁴ Both have been endorsed by the Court as describing activity that falls within article 4 of the Convention.⁶⁵

In Ransev, the Court said it considered that trafficking 'by its very nature and aim of exploitation, is based on the exercise of powers attaching to the right of ownership. It treats human beings as commodities to be bought and sold and put to forced labour, often for little or no payment, usually in the sex industry but also elsewhere.'⁶⁶ It said trafficking implied 'close surveillance of victims, whose movements are often circumscribed', and 'the use of violence and threats against victims, who live and work under poor conditions'.⁶⁷

Domestic servitude

Domestic servitude has been addressed as a distinct violation of article 4. Indeed, the Court has been critical of national legislation that focuses on domestic servitude solely from the standpoint of trafficking, resulting in distortions in investigations and leading to the conclusion that there is an inadequate legal framework capable of fulfilling the positive obligations imposed by article 4. According to the Court, domestic servitude is a specific offence, distinct from trafficking and exploitation, which involves a complex set of dynamics, involving both overt and more subtle forms of coercion, to force compliance. A thorough investigation into complaints of such conduct therefore requires an understanding of the many subtle ways an individual can fall under the control of another.⁶⁸

A specific offence of 'domestic servitude' is required as well as a distinct treatment of the phenomenon by the authorities.⁶⁹

Forced or compulsory labour (art. 4(2))

Paragraphs 2 and 3 are concerned with 'forced or compulsory labour'. The travaux préparatoires do not provide any assistance in interpreting this concept. However, the Court has said that it was 'evident' that the drafters of the European Convention, like those of the early version of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, relied 'to a large extent'⁷⁰ upon International Labour Organisation Convention No. 29 concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour, which was adopted in 1930 and entered into force in 1932. The Convention has been widely ratified by members of the Council of Europe and arguably is generally accepted, at least as far as the definitions are concerned. Pursuant to Convention No. 29, States undertake to 'suppress the use of forced or compulsory labour in all its forms within the shortest possible period' with a view to 'complete suppression' of the phenomenon.⁷¹

The main objective of Convention No. 29 was preventing the exploitation of labour in colonies. The Convention did not coin the expression 'forced or compulsory labour', which had already appeared in the Preamble of the 1926 Slavery Convention: 'The High Contracting Parties recognise that recourse to compulsory or forced labour may have grave consequences and undertake, each in respect of the territories placed under its sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection, suzerainty or tutelage, to take all necessary measures to prevent compulsory or forced labour from developing into conditions analogous to slavery.' The 1930 Convention was subsequently complemented, in 1957, by the adoption of Convention No. 105 concerning the Abolition of Forced Labour.⁷² According to the Court, there is a 'striking similarity, which is not accidental' between article 2 of Convention No. 29 and article 4(3) of the European Convention on Human Rights.⁷³ Article 2(1) of Convention No. 29 states that 'forced or compulsory labour' shall mean 'all work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered himself voluntarily'. The Court said it provides a 'starting-point for interpretation of article 4', although 'sight should not be lost of that Convention's special features or of the fact that it is a living instrument to be read "in the light of the notions currently prevailing in democratic States"'.⁷⁴

Article 4(2) speaks of 'labour' (travail), whereas Convention No. 29 refers to 'all work or service' (tout travail ou service), terms that are reprised with slight modification in article 4(3)(d) of the European Convention ('any work or service', tout travail ou service). Responding to the argument that 'labour' was confined to manual labour, the Court noted these variations in terminology, pointing as well to the very name of the International Labour Organisation (Organisation Internationale du Travail) in concluding that 'labour' within the meaning of article 4(2) was not limited to the field of manual labour.⁷⁵

The term 'forced' suggests physical or mental constraint, something the Court noted was absent in a case involving a lawyer who was required to work without remuneration as part of a legal aid scheme.⁷⁶ It also held that the term 'compulsion' could not refer to any form of legal compulsion or obligation. It gave as an example work carried out pursuant to a freely negotiated contract; it would not be deemed the result of compulsion solely because one part would be subject to sanctions for failure to honour the agreement. Therefore, in order to conclude that there is 'forced or compulsory labour', there must be a degree of physical or mental constraint, as well as some overriding of the victim's will.⁷⁷

Referring to the definition in Convention No. 29, the Court has insisted that the notion of compulsory labour means that it must be 'exacted . . . under the menace of any penalty' and performed against the will of the person concerned, which is to say work for which the person 'has not offered himself voluntarily'.⁷⁸ In the case of the legal aid requirement for lawyers, the Court has considered that the possibility of being excluded from the practice of law for failure to fulfil a requirement of unpaid labour is indeed a form of 'penalty'.⁷⁹ It reached a similar conclusion with respect to a practising lawyer who was obliged to serve as a legal guardian.⁸⁰ In a case involving a domestic labourer, the Court considered the penalty to be the threat of expulsion from the country.⁸¹ The Court declined to find a 'penalty' in a similar case of domestic labour, but said the victim was 'in an equivalent situation in terms of the perceived seriousness of the threat'. She was an adolescent girl living unlawfully in a foreign country in fear of arrest. Her oppressors 'nurtured that fear' through suggestions that they would regularize her status.⁸²

The second requirement drawn from Convention No. 29 is that the victim 'has not offered himself voluntarily'. Prior consent will generally be determined by considering all of the circumstances in order to assess whether it was in fact implied. Sometimes the terrible working conditions will make it obvious that there could be no genuine consent.⁸³ In the cases involving unpaid work by lawyers, the Court has noted that when an individual joins a professional body the existence of such duties is known to them, providing an element of prior consent, but it has said this is not sufficient to overcome the charge of compulsory labour.⁸⁴ Early case law of the European Commission took the position that in addition to being performed by the person against his or her will, it had to be 'unjust', 'oppressive', 'an unavoidable hardship', 'needlessly distressing', or 'somewhat harassing',⁸⁵ but the Court has not followed this approach.⁸⁶ For the Court, the issue is whether such requirements are so disproportionate that they could not have been accepted implicitly, bearing in mind the advantages attributed to professionals, including an effective monopoly over certain services, and the relatively insignificant amount of work required.⁸⁷ For much the same reason applications by other professionals, including notaries⁸⁸ and physicians, have been rejected.⁸⁹ A beneficiary of social assistance objected when she was required to take up employment deemed 'generally accepted' or else lose her entitlement to benefits. Declaring the application inadmissible, the Court said that 'a condition to the effect that a person must make demonstrable efforts in order to obtain and take up generally accepted employment cannot be considered unreasonable'.⁹⁰

'Delimitations' on forced or compulsory labour (art. 4(3))

Article 4(3) has been said not to 'limit' the exercise of the right set out in article 4(2) but rather to 'delimit' the content of the right. According to the Court, 'it forms a whole' with article 4(2), indicating what is not included within the term 'forced or compulsory labour'.⁹¹ The four sub-paragraphs of article 4(3) are diverse, but they are all 'grounded on the governing ideas of the general interest, social solidarity and what is in the normal or ordinary course of affairs'.⁹² For the European Commission on Human Rights, although 'forced or compulsory labour' will overlap with 'servitude', these two terms 'cannot be treated as equivalent'. Consequently, even a phenomenon contemplated by one of the sub-paragraphs of article 4(3) can, at least in principle, be addressed within the framework of the prohibition on slavery and servitude.⁹³

Work associated with detention (art. 4(3)(a))

Work that is required in the ordinary course of detention is not deemed to be 'forced or compulsory labour'. The rather verbose exception reads as follows: 'any work required to be done in the ordinary course of detention imposed according to the provisions of Article 5 of this Convention or during conditional release from such detention'. This delimitation is derived from article 2(2)(c) of International Labour Organisation Convention No. 29, where an even more elaborate formulation is employed: 'any work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law, provided that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority and that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations'. It may be that the intent of the provision in Convention No. 29 was to address sentences where labour was imposed as part of a custodial sentence. An early decision by the European Commission of Human Rights rejected the suggestion that article 4(3)(a) be interpreted as if it incorporated the terms of article 2(2)(c) of Convention No. 29.

In an early case heard by the European Commission of Human Rights, several German prisoners argued they were not being adequately remunerated for their work and that no social security contributions were being made on their behalf. They submitted that the work was performed for private businesses that had made their own contractual arrangements with the prison authorities. At the outset, the Commission noted that article 4 made no reference to remuneration of prisoners; for this reason, several applications by prisoners claiming higher payment for their work or the right to social security coverage had been declared inadmissible.⁹⁴ The Commission referred to the travaux préparatoires of the Convention, noting that article 4 was derived from the draft Covenant on Human Rights then before the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. The reason it contained a provision concerning work done in the ordinary course of detention was to provide a 'safeguard against arbitrary decision by authorities with regard to the work which might be required'.⁹⁵ There was no evidence, said the Commission, that the term 'ordinary' was in any way related to employment involving private businesses. The Commission referred to a United Nations study of prison labour indicating the involvement of private business interests in a number of States, including several in the Council of Europe.⁹⁶ The Commission noted the 1930 International Labour Organisation Convention's pejorative reference to prisoners being 'hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations', but said that the draft Covenant provision on which article 4 of the European Convention was based omitted these terms. Although nothing in the travaux préparatoires helped to explain the omission, the Commission took the view that this must have been due to an awareness that there was widespread involvement of private enterprise in prison labour.⁹⁷

When a recidivist prisoner claimed that he was forced to work because his early release was conditional on having some savings from work done in prison, the Court agreed that this was not far away from an obligation in the strict sense of the term.⁹⁸ Applying article 4(3)(a), the Court noted 'the work which Mr. Van Droogenbroeck was asked to do did not go beyond what is "ordinary" in this context since it was calculated to assist him in reintegrating himself into society and had as its legal basis provisions which find an equivalent in certain other member States of the Council of Europe'.⁹⁹

In a more recent case, the Grand Chamber considered the complaint of an Austrian prisoner whose prison work was not subject to contributions for old-age pension. The applicant submitted that the early decision of the European Commission dealing with the German prisoners should no longer be followed, and that the Court should recognize that prison labour without entitlement to old-age pension was no longer 'ordinary'. The Grand Chamber noted an 'evolving trend' within Europe to enable prisoners to benefit from social security systems, but added that 'while an absolute majority of Council of Europe member States provide prisoners with some kind of social security, only a small majority affiliate prisoners to their old-age pension system'.¹⁰⁰ Rejecting the application, it said there was not sufficient consensus within the Member States of the Council of Europe on the matter.¹⁰¹

The fact that prison labour may not be remunerated does not mean it is not covered by the exception set out in paragraph 4(a).¹⁰²

Military service (art. 4(3)(b))

Article 4(3)(b) excludes 'any service of a military character or, in case of conscientious objectors in countries where they are recognised, service exacted instead of compulsory military service' from the ambit of forced or compulsory labour. The 1930 Convention on Forced Labour of the International Labour Organisation formulates this delimitation without reference to conscientious objection: 'any work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws for work of a purely military character'.¹⁰³ At the time the European Convention was adopted, compulsory military service was fairly general among the founding members of the Council of Europe. It has now largely been done away with, although the practice persists in some countries in Central and Eastern Europe, as well as Cyprus and Switzerland. The European Court has taken note of this trend, citing the replacement of conscript armies with professional ones in Spain (2002), Portugal (2004), Hungary and the Czech Republic (2005), Slovakia and Bosnia and Herzegovina (2006), Romania, Italy, and Latvia (2007).¹⁰⁴

Issues concerning article 4 and military service do not only arise as a result of conscription, however. In 1968, the European Commission examined the application of four British soldiers who had been recruited as adolescents, some of them as young as fifteen, within the United Kingdom and its colonies. The Commission referred to the travaux préparatoires, noting the influence of the 1930 International Labour Organisation Convention, where the words 'any work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws' were employed. It observed that in the early draft of the United Nations Covenant, which formed a model for article 4 of the Convention, those words were replaced with 'any service of a military character', although without any explanation for this change being provided in the documentation. The Commission said that 'it is safe to assume that in admitting the word "compulsory" it was intended also to cover the obligation to continue a service entered into on a voluntary basis'.¹⁰⁵

With respect to conscientious objection, the European Commission on Human Rights noted that the Convention does not require States to make alternative civilian service available. However, if States make civilian service a requirement as a substitute for military service, the Commission said it was clear that this could not be regarded as forced or compulsory labour.¹⁰⁶ The Commission also linked the reference to conscientious objection in article 4(3)(b) to article 9 of the Convention, where some have invoked freedom of thought, conscience, and religion in order to resist both military and alternative service on religious grounds.¹⁰⁷ It concluded that by using the words 'in countries where they are recognised', the Convention left States with the choice as to whether conscientious objection should be allowed and, if so, to permit alternative service.¹⁰⁸ The question only came before the Court in 2011. The Court had explicitly reserved the question of the relationship between article 4(3)(b) and article 9 on two earlier occasions.¹⁰⁹ Rejecting the Commission's approach, the Grand Chamber cited a comment in the travaux préparatoires:

In sub-paragraph [(b)], the clause relating to conscientious objectors was intended to indicate that any national service required of them by law would not fall within the scope of forced or compulsory labour. As the concept of conscientious objection was not recognised in many countries, the phrase 'in countries where conscientious objection is recognised' was inserted.

According to the Grand Chamber, this confirmed that the sole purpose of article 4(3)(b) was to clarify the scope of article 4(2). 'In itself it neither recognises nor excludes a right to conscientious objection and should therefore not have a delimiting effect on the rights guaranteed by Article 9', it said.¹¹⁰

Emergency service (art. 4(3)(c))

Any service exacted in case of an emergency or calamity threatening the life or well-being of the community is excluded from the scope of forced or compulsory labour by article 4(3)(c). The corresponding provision in the 1930 International Labour Organisation Convention reads: 'any work or service exacted in cases of emergency, that is to say, in the event of war or of a calamity or threatened calamity, such as fire, flood, famine, earthquake, violent epidemic or epizootic diseases, invasion by animal, insect or vegetable pests, and in general any circumstance that would endanger the existence or the well-being of the whole or part of the population'.

This provision has only been interpreted in a few cases before the European Commission, and apparently never by the Court. In one, the Commission deemed that a requirement of work in a public dental service in northern Norway was covered by the provision.¹¹¹ In another, a Hamburg lawyer objected to the requirement that he assist in the gassing of foxholes as a measure to protect against rabies. The Commission said that even if the obligation could be considered compulsory labour, 'which is doubtful', the requirement that a hunting tenant participate in measures to control epidemics would be justified under article 4(3)(c) or (d).¹¹²

Normal civil obligations (art. 4(3)(d))

Any work or service that forms part of normal civic obligations is excluded from the scope of forced or compulsory labour in accordance with article 4(3)(d). There are two paragraphs in article 2(2) of the 1930 International Labour Organisation Convention that appear to be at the origin of the provision: 'any work or service which forms part of the normal civic obligations of the citizens of a fully self-governing country',¹¹³ and 'minor communal services of a kind which, being performed by the members of the community in the direct interest of the said community, can therefore be considered as normal civic obligations incumbent upon the members of the community, provided that the members of the community or their direct representatives shall have the right to be consulted in regard to the need for such services'.¹¹⁴ Jury service¹¹⁵ and service in a fire brigade, or alternatively a payment in lieu of service,¹¹⁶ have been recognized by the Court as examples of such normal civic obligations.¹¹⁷

Discrimination

Article 14 of the Convention provides the basis for a distinct assessment of the role of prohibited discrimination with respect to slavery and servitude. Article 14 is complementary to the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. It has no independent existence, applying only with respect to other protected rights and freedoms, including article 4. A violation of article 4 is not necessary for article 14 to be engaged, but the claim of discrimination must bear upon the rights that are protected by article 4. The Court has considered whether special obligations imposed upon practising lawyers without remuneration, including the provision of legal aid and service as a guardian, could be deemed discriminatory. After concluding that the duty to act as a guardian was not forced or compulsory labour in accordance with article 4(2), the Court considered whether limiting the duty to notaries and lawyers was discriminatory, in breach of article 14 of the Convention. It accepted that this amounted to a difference in treatment between practising lawyers and other persons who would have studied law and possibly even received professional legal training but who were not practicing as lawyers. Noting various functions entrusted to lawyers on an exclusive basis, the Court said this was enough for it to conclude that the two groups were not in relevantly similar situations.¹¹⁸ It reached the same conclusion in a case concerning legal aid.¹¹⁹

Several companies in Austria claimed to be victims of discrimination with respect to article 4(2) because of an obligation imposed upon them to calculate and withhold certain taxes and other social security contributions from salaries and wages of their employees. Declaring the application manifestly ill-founded, the Commission said that there was no differentiation in any way between groups of persons that could be considered comparable.¹²⁰

In a case concerning the obligation of jury duty, the applicant demonstrated that this was imposed upon men in a disproportionate manner. The respondent State argued that this could be explained by several factors, including the selection of jurors from the sector of the population active in the economy and professional life and the availability of exemptions from jury service for those caring for a family. Also, 'for cultural reasons', the State claimed that defence lawyers might tend to challenge female jurors and thereby exclude them from service. The Court was not impressed, and said it had not been shown that the difference in treatment 'pursued a legitimate aim and that there was a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised'. As a result, Malta was found to be in breach of article 14 taken in conjunction with article 4(3)(d).¹²¹

There was a similar manifestation of gender discrimination in the requirement of service in the fire brigade, or alternatively to make a financial contribution, imposed by the Land of Baden-Württemberg. This was compulsory for men but not women, resulting in a violation of article 14 in conjunction with article 14(3)(d).¹²²

Reservations

Portugal formulated the following reservation: 'Article 4(3)(b) of the Convention will be applied subject to Article 276 of the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic, which provides for compulsory civic service.'¹²³ It was withdrawn in 1987.¹²⁴

Moldova made a reservation 'with a view to retaining the possibility of enforcing criminal sentences in the form of non-custodial forced labour'. The reservation specified that it would be valid for one year.¹²⁵

Article 5. Right to liberty and security/Droit à la liberté et à la sûreté

1. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law:

- (a) the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court;
- (b) the lawful arrest or detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court or in order to secure the fulfilment of any obligation prescribed by law;
- (c) the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent his committing an offence or fleeing after having done so;
- (d) the detention of a minor by lawful order for the purpose of educational supervision or his lawful detention for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority;
- (e) the lawful detention of persons for the prevention of the spreading of infectious diseases, of persons of unsound mind, alcoholics or drug addicts or vagrants;
- (f) the lawful arrest or detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorised entry into the country or of a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition.

2. Everyone who is arrested shall be informed promptly, in a language which he understands, of the reasons for his arrest and of any charge against him.

Introductory comments

The right to liberty and security of the person is essentially concerned with arbitrary detention. In positive law, protection against arbitrary detention can be traced back at least as far as the edict of de homine libero exhibendo in the Digest of Justinian. Its most celebrated early formulation is in clause 39 of the Magna Carta: 'No free man shall be seized or imprisoned, or stripped of his rights or possessions, or outlawed or exiled, or deprived of his standing in any other way, nor will we proceed with force against him, or send others to do so, except by the lawful judgement of his equals or by the law of the land.'¹ Protection against arbitrary detention was ensured through the 'great writ'² of habeas corpus,³ a procedural mechanism enshrined in statute law at the time of the English revolution.⁴ Its importance was confirmed by article 7 of the French Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen ('Nul homme ne peut être accusé, arrêté ni détenu que dans les cas déterminés par la loi, et selon les formes qu'elle a prescrites') and in the Constitution of the United States ('[t]he Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it'⁵).

Article 5 of the European Convention is derived from two of the most laconic provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, article 3 ('Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person') and article 9 ('No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.') Translated into treaty norms in article 5 of the European Convention, these succinct and straightforward principles drawn from the Universal Declaration required 371 words for their expression.

The provisions in article 5 are both extremely detailed and also, in part, somewhat embarrassingly archaic, with their references to 'persons of unsound mind' and 'vagrants'. By contrast, the succinct texts of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights remain fresh and contemporary. The Charter of Fundamental Rights returns to a simple formulation, reproducing the first sentence of article 5 of the Convention: 'Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person.' It is meant to have the same meaning and scope as article 5 of the European Convention.⁶

Drafting of the provision

The initial draft European Convention on Human Rights prepared by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement recognized '[f]reedom from arbitrary arrest, detention and exile'.⁷ At the first session of the Consultative Assembly, Pierre-Henri Teitgen called for adoption of a convention that would include 'freedom from arbitrary arrest'.⁸ Asked to prepare a draft text for discussion in the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions at the first session of the Consultative Assembly, Teitgen proposed the following: 'Security of person, in accordance with Articles 3, 5 and 8 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations' and 'Immunity from all arbitrary arrest, detention and exile, in accordance with Articles 9, 10 and 11 of the United Nations Declaration'.⁹ There was no disagreement on the text dealing with security of person. With respect to the provision on arbitrary arrest, an amendment to replace 'arrest, detention or arbitrary exile' with 'arbitrary arrest, sentence, detention or exile' was defeated, as was a proposal from Giovanni Persico of Italy to insert 'or other measures or sentences' after 'arbitrary exile', both by twelve votes to three with two abstentions. The Legal Committee accepted an amendment to replace 'or arbitrary exile' by 'exile or other arbitrary measures'.¹⁰ The two provisions were adopted by the plenary Consultative Assembly for transmission to the Committee of Ministers.¹¹

The Committee of Ministers decided to refer the Consultative Assembly draft to a Committee of Experts. The Committee of Experts, which convened in February and March 1950, was instructed to pay 'due attention' to the draft Covenant that had been adopted by the United Nations Commission of Human Rights in June 1949.¹² Indeed, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights had considered a detailed provision on arbitrary arrest and detention in its work on the draft Covenant on human rights:

1. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.
2. No one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as established by law.
3. Any one who is arrested shall be informed promptly of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him.

Any one arrested or detained on the charge of having committed a crime or of preparing to commit a crime shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release. Pending trial, release may be conditioned by guarantees to appear for trial.
5. Every one who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.
6. Every person who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty shall have an enforceable right to compensation.¹³

A competing version had been proposed in the Commission on Human Rights by Australia, Denmark, France, Lebanon, and the United Kingdom as 'a more satisfactory basis for further consideration':

1. No person shall be deprived of his liberty save by legal procedure in the case of:
 - (a) the lawful detention of a person after a conviction or as a security measure involving deprivation of liberty;
 - (b) the lawful arrest and detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order or injunction of a court;
 - (c) the arrest of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on a reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or which is reasonably considered to be necessary to prevent his committing a crime or fleeing after having done so;
 - (d) the lawful detention of persons of unsound mind or of minors, by lawful order, the purpose of educational surveillance;
 - (e) the lawful arrest or detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorised entry into the country or of a person against whom deportation or extradition proceedings are pending.

The texts of paragraphs 3 to 5 of the initial draft were to be added. The five States expressed their belief that 'it is possible thus to define all the limitations of these rights which contracting States can reasonably require, in a form that is both brief and comprehensive'.¹⁴

A document prepared by the Secretariat-General of the Council of Europe for the Committee of Experts commented upon the draft provision in the Covenant, noting that it contained 'details, regulations and limitations concerning the right of the State to encroach on individual freedom which are not to be found in Articles 9, 10 and 11 of the Universal Declaration to which paragraph 3 of Article 2 of the European Resolution refers. In any case, the Assembly had not taken into consideration the case of so-called administrative internment'.¹⁵ It also noted that 'the American system guaranteeing "the due process of law" for the taking of life and liberty was rejected owing to its non-existence in other States', that 'enumeration of exceptions was rejected', and that 'an American amendment adding the word "arbitrarily" was rejected pending a further study by the Commission'.¹⁶

At the first Committee of Experts session in February 1950, Sweden proposed adding the following the text: 'This provision should not exclude the right to take necessary measures to fight vagrancy and alcoholism or to ensure respect of obligations to pay a family upkeep allowance.¹⁷ The United Kingdom also proposed an amendment with reference to article 9 of the draft United Nations Covenant and its mention of 'arbitrary arrest'. The United Kingdom said the word 'arbitrary' was 'vague and its force undefined'. It proposed a text largely based on the five-State draft of the corresponding provision in the Covenant being considered by the Commission on Human Rights:

No one shall be deprived of his liberty save by legal procedure in the case of:

- a) The lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court or as a security measure;
- b) The lawful arrest and detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court;
- c) The arrest of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on suspicion of having committed an offence or which is reasonable considered to be necessary to prevent his committing a crime or fleeing after having done so;
- d) The lawful detention of persons of unsound mind or of minors by lawful order for the purpose of educational surveillance;
- e) The lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorised entry into the country or of a person against whom deportation or extradition proceedings are pending.¹⁸

The text of paragraphs 3 to 5 of the initial United Nations draft were to be added without change.

The representative of Luxembourg commented on the terms 'exile and other measures'.

No doubt the reference to Articles 10 and 11 of the United Nations Declaration gives an idea of the meaning of the expression 'and other measures.' However, the text might give rise to uncertainties. In using the expression 'and other measures' after the word 'exile,' it is possible to take into consideration the expulsion measures which certain States take by administrative action against undesirable aliens. Since these measures are taken by administrative and not legal action, they might be interpreted as meaning that they are arbitrary measures (cf. Articles 8 and 10 of the United Nations Declaration). It is therefore suggested that it should be indicated that the word 'exile' refers only to the victims of an expulsion measure taken by the State of which they are nationals.¹⁹

It was agreed to acknowledge in the report the difficulty indicated but there was no agreement to amend the provision.²⁰

The first session of the Committee of Experts agreed upon provisions that reproduced word for word articles 3 and 9 of the Universal Declaration. Sweden's proposal was withdrawn on the condition that the issues it raised were to be mentioned in the report. As a result, the following comment was included:

The Swedish representative further requested that it be put on record that the text of Article 6 covered, in particular, the right of signatory States to take the necessary measures for combating vagrancy and drunkenness or to ensure respect of obligations to pay alimony costs; the Committee had no doubt that this could be agreed to since such restrictions were justified by the requirements of public morality and order.²¹

At the second session of the Committee of Experts, the British presented a revised draft:

1. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law:
 - a) The lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court;
 - b) The lawful arrest and detention of a person for noncompliance with the lawful order of a court;
 - c) The arrest and detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or which is reasonable considered to be necessary to prevent his committing a crime or fleeing after having done so;
 - d) The lawful detention of a person of unsound mind or of a minor by lawful order for the purpose of educational supervision;
 - e) The lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorised entry into the country or of a person against whom deportation or extradition proceedings are pending.²²
2. Any one who is arrested shall be informed promptly of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him.
3. Any one arrested or detained on the charge of having committed a crime or to prevent his committing a crime shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial. Release may be conditioned by guarantees to appear for trial.
4. Every one who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.
5. Everyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty shall have an enforceable right to compensation.²³

A drafting committee modified paragraph 1(b) by the addition of the phrase 'or in order to secure the fulfilment of any obligation prescribed by law'. Paragraph 1(d) was divided into two distinct provisions:

- (d) the lawful detention of minors by lawful order for the purpose of educational supervision;
- (e) the lawful detention of persons for prevention of the spreading of infectious diseases, of persons of unsound mind, alcoholic or drug addicts or vagrants.

Paragraph 2 was changed by the drafting committee as follows: 'Anyone who is arrested shall be informed promptly, in a language he understands, of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him.'²⁴ The right to compensation in case of unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty had been removed.

The Committee of Experts submitted two alternative provisions to the Committee of Ministers, one corresponding to articles 3 and 9 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the other the British draft with some very minor drafting changes.²⁵

A commentary accompanying the drafts explained the removal of the provision dealing with an enforceable right to compensation. It said that the majority of members considered that the text might be held to impose an obligation to ensure payment of damages, for example as a result of a civil action, and that this was an 'undesirable requirement'. The United Kingdom delegate registered his disagreement with the omission.²⁶

The Conference of Senior Officials that met in June 1950 combined the two proposals of the Committee of Experts by placing a text based upon article 3 of the Universal Declaration at the beginning of the provision ('Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person') and then continuing with the longer text derived from the British proposal. In paragraph 3, after the words 'committed a crime', the words 'in accordance with the provisions of para. 1(c)' were added. Finally, the controversial paragraph concerning compensation returned as paragraph 5: 'Anyone who has been victim of unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty shall have an enforceable right to compensation.'²⁷ Comments were attached to the draft:

Article 5, para. 1(c) and 3.

The Conference considered it useful to point out that where authorised arrest or detention is effected on reasonable suspicion of preventing the commission of a crime, it should not lead to the introduction of a regime of a Police State. It may, however, be necessary in certain circumstances to arrest an individual in order to prevent his committing a crime, even if the facts which show his intention to commit the crime do not of themselves constitute a penal offence. In order to avoid any possible abuses of the right thus conferred on public authorities, Article 13, para. 2 will have to be applied strictly.²⁸

A comment also explained the inclusion of the provision dealing with compensation. Reservations were expressed by the Italian and Danish delegates on this issue.²⁹

In the Committee of Ministers, the United Kingdom made the following observation:

Article 5(1)(d), as at present drafted, does not provide for the possibility of detaining minors for the purpose of bringing them before the court for the making of a 'lawful order'. Many children brought before the courts have committed no offence at all and the purpose of their detention is to secure their removal from harmful surroundings, so that they are not covered by article 5(1)(c). At the same time, the circumstances of the case usually demand that the child should be removed from harmful surroundings before he can be brought before the court. H.M. Government therefore wish Article 5(1)(d) to be expanded to read: 'The lawful detention of minors by lawful order for the purpose of educational supervision, or their lawful detention for the purpose of bringing them before the competent legal authorities.'³⁰

This proposal met with agreement in the Sub-Committee on Human Rights and was incorporated in the final draft.

The final text of article 5 was agreed to by the Committee of Ministers at its meeting on 7 August 1950.³¹ Minor technical adjustments to the text were made by a Committee of Legal Experts on 3 November 1950.³²

The heading 'Right to liberty and security' was added by Protocol No. 11.³³

Analysis and interpretation

Article 5 of the Convention guarantees the right to liberty and security, which is of primary importance in a 'democratic society' within the meaning of the Convention.³⁴ It enshrines a fundamental human right, namely 'the protection of the individual against arbitrary interference by the State with his or her right to liberty'.³⁵ The guarantees in article 5 apply to 'everyone'.³⁶

The first paragraph of article 5 sets out the general principle, followed by an exhaustive enumeration of exceptions, that is, of permissible deprivation of liberty. Paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 are mainly procedural in nature, in that they specify the requirements in terms of arrest and detention and the modalities for verification and contestation of their lawfulness. Paragraph 5 provides a right to compensation in the event that article 5 has been violated.

Physical liberty and scope of application

The right to liberty as proclaimed in article 5 is concerned with physical liberty. Its purpose is to protect against any arbitrary deprivation of that liberty in its classic sense of imprisonment. It is not concerned with 'mere restrictions' on freedom of movement, a right that is addressed by article 2 of Protocol No. 4 to the Convention.³⁷ Nevertheless, the difference between restrictions on movement serious enough to fall under article 5(1) rather than article 2 of Protocol No. 4 is one of degree or intensity, not of nature or substance.³⁸ Classifying them is 'no easy task in that some borderline cases are a matter of pure opinion'.³⁹ For example, persons stopped by police for a search lasting less than 30 minutes were nevertheless deprived of their liberty. They would have been liable to arrest, detention, and criminal charge had they refused. 'This element of coercion is indicative of a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Article 5 § 1', said the Court.⁴⁰ In making the determination, 'the starting point must be his concrete situation and account must be taken of a whole range of criteria such as the type, duration, effects and manner of implementation of the measure in question'.⁴¹ The European Court of Human Rights is not bound by the legal characterization given to the situation by the domestic authorities and makes its own autonomous assessment of the matter.⁴²

Deprivation of liberty, within the meaning of article 5(1), has both an objective and a subjective dimension. It is objective to the extent the person is confined for a length of time that is not negligible. It is subjective in that the person has not consented to such confinement.⁴³

In assessing the objective factors, account will be taken of the existence of a possibility of leaving the restricted area, the degree of supervision and control over the person, his or her isolation, and the availability of social contacts.⁴⁴ If the facts indicate a deprivation of liberty, the relatively short duration of detention does not affect the conclusion.⁴⁵ For example, police powers to stop and search indicate a deprivation of liberty despite the short duration of the measure.

Aside from formal arrest and detention within a criminal law setting, article 5 has been applied to the placement of persons in institutions for psychiatric care and social services,⁴⁶ international zones in airports,⁴⁷ interrogation in police stations,⁴⁸ house arrest,⁴⁹ confinement in an 'open prison',⁵⁰ and crowd control efforts.⁵¹ On the other hand, disciplinary measures taken within a prison that affect conditions of detention do not fall within the scope of article 5(1). A decision by prison authorities to confine an inmate to her cell 'was part of the normal operation of the prison' and was 'concerned rather with restriction of movement not with liberty'.⁵²

As for the subjective aspect, the Court has not attached too much importance to this. In one case, it held that 'the right to liberty is too important in a democratic society for a person to lose the benefit of Convention protection for the single reason that he may have given himself up to be taken into detention'.⁵³ That a person lacks legal capacity does not necessarily mean that he or she cannot understand and consent to the situation.⁵⁴

Security of person and positive obligations

Using words taken from article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, article 5 protects the 'liberty and security of person' of the individual. The case law of the Convention organs has focused almost exclusively on 'liberty' and no distinct or autonomous meaning has been given to 'security of person'. In a very early case, the Commission noted that just because 'liberty' and 'security' were closely connected did not mean that 'the term "security" is otiose'.

In the Commission's view, the protection of 'security' is in this context concerned with arbitrary interference, by a public authority, with an individual's personal 'liberty'. Or, in other words, any decision taken within the sphere of Article 5 must, in order to safeguard the individual's right to 'security of person', conform to the procedural as well as the substantive requirements laid down by an already existing law. This interpretation is confirmed both by the text of Article 5 and by the preparatory work of the Convention, which show that the protection against arbitrary arrest and detention was one of the principal considerations of the drafters of this treaty.⁵⁵

In a case involving a disguised extradition from France to Switzerland, the Court said: "What is at stake here is not only the "right to liberty" but also the "right to security of person".⁵⁶ It concluded that there was a breach both of the right to liberty and of the right to security of person, but without attempting to explain or discuss the distinction.⁵⁷

Interpreting the equivalent provision in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, where the wording is identical to that of article 5 of the European Convention, the Human Rights Committee has stated that '[a]lthough in the Covenant the only reference to the right to security of person is to be found in article 9, there is no evidence that it was intended to narrow the concept of the right to security only to situations of formal deprivation of liberty'. It has used the concept in order to develop the obligation of States to protect horizontal violations, by non-State actors, explaining that

'[a]n interpretation of article 9 which would allow a State party to ignore threats to the personal security of non-detained persons within its jurisdiction would render totally ineffective the guarantees of the Covenant'.⁵⁸ The Committee has applied the right to security of person in cases involving death threats, harassment, and various forms of intimidation.⁵⁹

The European Court of Human Rights has addressed the acts of private individuals involving deprivation of liberty, for example in human trafficking cases, but without invoking the notion of 'security of person'.⁶⁰ Article 5 imposes upon the State a positive obligation 'to take measures providing effective protection of vulnerable persons, including reasonable steps to prevent a deprivation of liberty of which the authorities have or ought to have knowledge'.⁶¹

The positive obligation is also engaged in disappearance cases. When the Court considered several applications involving Greek Cypriots who had last been seen during the Turkish invasion of the island in 1974, 'in circumstances falling within the control of the Turkish or Turkish Cypriot forces', it concluded: 'While there is no evidence that any of the missing persons were still in detention in the period under the Court's consideration, it remains incumbent on the Turkish Government to show that they have since carried out an effective investigation into the arguable claim that the two missing men had been taken into custody and not seen subsequently.' The Court said that the failure to conduct the requisite investigation constituted 'a continuing violation of article 5'.⁶²

'Lawfulness'

The notion of 'lawfulness' is fundamental to article 5. The introductory portion of article 5(1) sets out the condition that any deprivation of liberty be 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law'. Each of the sub-paragraphs of article 5(1) employs the word 'lawful'. When it uses the words 'lawful' and 'lawfulness', the Convention is referring essentially to national law. It sets out an obligation to conform to the substantive and procedural rules of national law.⁶³ Unacknowledged detention of an individual, without some detailed records of such matters as the date, time, and location of detention, the name of the detainee, the reasons for the detention, and the name of the person effecting it 'must be seen as incompatible with the requirement of lawfulness and with the very purpose of Article 5 of the Convention'.⁶⁴ Various violations of national law have been held to constitute unlawful detention and violations of the right to liberty. For example, where the authorities had not applied to extend a detention order within the time limit authorized by law the Court held that there was a breach of article 5.⁶⁵ Nevertheless, not every flaw in a detention order will be fatal and lead to a violation. Unless it constitutes a 'gross and obvious irregularity', a defect in a detention order may be remedied by appellate courts without the implication that the initial detention was contrary to article 5.⁶⁶

There will be deference to the national authorities in the interpretation and application of their own law. However, because failure to comply with national law constitutes a breach of the Convention, the Court is entitled to review whether the national law has been respected.⁶⁷ In addition, in assessing the lawfulness of deprivation of liberty, 'the Court is not confined to the declared, ostensible purposes of the arrest or detention in question, but also looks at the real intent and purposes behind it'.⁶⁸

The starting point for determination of 'lawfulness' is the existence of a court order. Sometimes, a court order of detention will be found to be unlawful by a superior court, in accordance with national law, but this does not mean that it is necessarily invalid.⁶⁹ The national courts may recognize that there have been flaws in domestic proceedings without the detention itself being contrary to article 5.⁷⁰ Nevertheless, where there is a 'gross and obvious irregularity' the detention will be contrary to article 5.⁷¹ In making its autonomous determination, the Court 'will have regard to all the circumstances of the case, including, in particular, the assessment made by the domestic courts. It observes that according to the findings of the German courts, the order in question did not suffer from a serious and obvious defect which rendered it null and void.'⁷² Similarly, failure to officially notify a detention order was not a 'gross or obvious irregularity where the authorities genuinely believed that the order had been notified'.⁷³ The Court has excused 'mere clerical error' in an arrest warrant or detention order that was later corrected by a judicial authority.⁷⁴ But according to a compelling dissenting opinion, the fact that a defect is procedural or formal rather than substantive 'does not make the defect any less serious. The Court's case law makes no distinction between substantive and procedural rules of domestic law: both have to be complied with to ensure the lawfulness and legality of the detention.'⁷⁵ An order of indefinite detention is incompatible with the 'lawfulness' requirement of article 5.⁷⁶

It is not sufficient for the State to comply with national law in order for it to respect article 5: 'Article 5 § 1 requires in addition that any deprivation of liberty should be in keeping with the purpose of protecting the individual from arbitrariness.'⁷⁷ This requires an assessment whether the domestic law itself is consistent with the Convention, 'including the general principles expressed or implied therein, notably the principle of legal certainty'.⁷⁸ Where deprivation of liberty is concerned, it is particularly important that the general principle of legal certainty be satisfied.⁷⁹ Legal certainty means that the law governing conditions for deprivation of liberty be accessible, clearly defined, and that its application be foreseeable.⁸⁰

In Poland, a domestic practice of keeping a person in detention under a bill of indictment had no specific basis in either legislation or case law. As the government conceded, this 'stemmed from the fact that Polish criminal legislation at the material time lacked clear rules governing the situation of a detainee in court proceedings, after the expiry of the term of his detention fixed in the last detention order made at the investigation stage'. It was a short step for the Court to conclude that the absence of any precise provisions governing prolongation of detention at the investigation stage could not satisfy the requirement of foreseeability.⁸¹ Moreover, the practice that developed in order to address the lacuna in the statute by which a person could be detained 'for an unlimited and unpredictable time and without his detention being based on a concrete legal provision or on any judicial decision' was itself contrary to the principle of legal certainty.⁸²

Problems of legal certainty often manifest themselves when the authorities themselves cannot agree upon how legal provisions are to be interpreted and applied. Russian authorities and courts provided inconsistent and mutually exclusive interpretations of legal regulations governing detention for the purpose of extradition. The European Court of Human Rights said that Russian laws were 'neither precise nor foreseeable in their application and fell short of the "quality of law" standard required under the Convention'.⁸³ Similarly, Lithuanian authorities provided three different interpretations of national legislation, leading the Court to observe that the measures were 'vague enough to cause confusion even amongst the competent State authorities'.⁸⁴

Complexity in national law does not mean there is no certainty. What may appear to be an inscrutable text can nevertheless provide foreseeable guidance to a detained person, 'if necessary with the advice of counsel'.⁸⁵ The Court has said that 'in general, the principle of legal certainty may be compromised if domestic courts introduce exceptions in their case law which run counter to the wording of the applicable statutory provisions'. However, it has said that legal certainty is not threatened in every case, particularly where there is well-established precedent.⁸⁶

Arbitrariness

Protecting the individual from arbitrariness is said to be the underlying purpose of article 5 of the Convention. No detention that is arbitrary can be compatible with article 5.⁸⁷ The notion of 'arbitrariness' in this context extends beyond the lack of conformity with national law. As a consequence, a deprivation of liberty that is lawful under domestic law can still be arbitrary and thus contrary to the Convention.⁸⁸

Detention will be deemed 'arbitrary' where there is an element of bad faith or deception by the authorities, even if national law has been observed in a technical sense.⁸⁹ Also, the order of detention and its execution or implementation must genuinely conform to the purposes of the restrictions set out in the sub-paragraphs of article 5(1).⁹⁰ There must also be a relationship between the ground justifying detention and the place and conditions of detention.⁹¹ The necessity of the detention is a factor in assessing arbitrariness. Even if national law is respected, meeting the test of 'lawfulness', deprivation of liberty must also be necessary in the circumstances.⁹² In assessing arbitrariness, the absence⁹³ or extreme brevity⁹⁴ of reasoning in a detention order is an important consideration. In several cases involving denial of interim release on grounds of 'public order', the Court has found there to be a violation of article 5(1) because of a lack of any reasons for the decision.⁹⁵ However, the Court did not find a violation of article 5 where the domestic courts quashed a detention order because it was not reasoned, yet considered there were grounds for detention.⁹⁶

The assessment of arbitrariness varies depending on the rationale for the deprivation of liberty.⁹⁷ With respect to detention pursuant to a criminal conviction in accordance with sub-paragraph (a), the decision to impose a sentence of detention and the length of that sentence are matters for the national authorities and not for the Court, absent evidence of bad faith.⁹⁸ In the case of detention for non-compliance with a court order (sub-para. 5(1)(b)), detention of a minor (sub-para. 5(1)(d)) and detention on medical grounds (sub-para. 5(1)(e)), the notion of arbitrariness dictates an assessment whether detention was necessary in order to achieve the stated aim, and whether the result could have been achieved using less severe measures.⁹⁹ According to the Court, 'detention of an individual is such a serious measure that it is only justified where other, less severe measures have been considered and found to be insufficient to safeguard the individual or public interest which might require that the person concerned be detained'.¹⁰⁰

In immigration and deportation cases (sub-para. 5(1)(f)), the Grand Chamber has said that it is unnecessary for the State to demonstrate that detention be reasonably considered necessary, for example to prevent the commission of an offence or flight.¹⁰¹ All that is required is that 'action is being taken with a view to deportation' and it is 'immaterial . . . whether the underlying decision to expel can be justified under national or Convention law'.¹⁰² Nevertheless, detention for such a purpose can only be justifiable as long as deportation proceedings are in progress. If they are not or are no longer being pursued with due diligence, detention will no longer be compatible with article 5.¹⁰³

With respect to appearance before a court of someone who has been arrested (sub-paragraph 5(1)(c)) or detained on medical grounds (sub-paragraph 5(1)(e)), the speed with which the national courts replace a detention order that has expired or that has been found to be defective is also relevant in assessing arbitrariness.¹⁰⁴ Although it is 'inconceivable' that a person should remain detained if there is a court order for release,¹⁰⁵ it is recognized that some delay in implementing a decision is understandable and even inevitable, although this must be kept to a minimum.¹⁰⁶

Grounds for detention (art. 5(1))

After stating the principle that everyone has the right to liberty and security of person, article 5(1) states that deprivation of liberty may be allowed 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' in six situations, set out in sub-paragraphs (a) to (f). The list of permissible grounds is an exhaustive one,¹⁰⁷ and 'no deprivation of liberty will be lawful unless it falls within one of those grounds'.¹⁰⁸ The list of permissible grounds is to be interpreted restrictively.¹⁰⁹ Even detention of very short duration falls within the scope of article 5(1).¹¹⁰ The categories are not mutually exclusive. There is no reason why more than one may not apply to the same situation at any given time. The purpose and character of the detention may change with the passage of time so that one ground ceases to be relevant but another takes its place.¹¹¹

Suggestions that article 5(1) permits a balance to be struck between the right to liberty of the individual and the interest of the State in protecting its population, for example from terrorist threats, have been rejected as inconsistent with the codification of limitations on the right to freedom in the provision: 'If detention does not fit within the confines of the paragraphs as interpreted by the Court, it cannot be made to fit by an appeal to the need to balance the interests of the State against those of the detainee.'¹¹²

Internment and preventive detention without charge are incompatible with the fundamental right to liberty.¹¹³ States may only resort to these practices, in peacetime, if they derogate from article 5 in accordance with article 15.¹¹⁴ According to the Grand Chamber, these practices can only be compatible with article 5 'in cases of international armed conflict, where the taking of prisoners of war and the detention of civilians who pose a threat to security are accepted features of international humanitarian law'.¹¹⁵

Post-conviction detention (art. 5(1)(a))

Post-conviction detention is obviously not a violation of article 5. Article 5(1)(a) applies to a 'conviction by a competent court' that results in deprivation of liberty. It does not matter that the conviction is pronounced in a disciplinary rather than a genuinely criminal matter.¹¹⁶ In a case where compulsory residence was ordered not for a specific offence but because of a 'propensity to crime', the Court held that this did not fit within the terms of article 5(1)(a). It said that for there to be a 'conviction', there must be an offence. Anything else would not be compatible with 'the principle of narrow interpretation to be observed in this area... nor with the fact that that word implies a finding of guilt'.¹¹⁷

Article 5(1)(a) does not prevent States from enforcing detention orders imposed by foreign courts,¹¹⁸ without them being required to verify that the trial proceedings respected all of the requirements of article 6, as this could 'thwart the current trend towards strengthening international cooperation in the administration of justice'.¹¹⁹ However, detention resulting from a conviction by a foreign court that constituted a 'flagrant denial of justice' cannot be compatible with article 5(1)(a).¹²⁰

The 'court' contemplated by article 5(1)(a) 'does not necessarily have to be a court of law of the classic kind integrated within the standard judicial machinery of the country'.¹²¹ The Convention uses the word 'court' (in French, tribunal) in several provisions¹²² in order to 'denote bodies which exhibit not only common fundamental features, of which the most important is independence of the executive and of the parties to the case... but also the guarantees of judicial procedure'.¹²³ The 'court' should have the competence to order release should the detention be unlawful.¹²⁴

Detention contemplated by article 5(1)(a) must take place 'after conviction'. Not only does it follow the conviction in a chronological sense but it must also be a consequence of the conviction.¹²⁵ It applies from the moment of conviction at trial, even if the trial judgment is under appeal, given that the guilt of the person has already been determined.¹²⁶ Although appellate proceedings may subsequently determine that detention is unlawful, this will not necessarily have as a consequence a determination that the deprivation of liberty is contrary to article 5.¹²⁷ Nevertheless, as time passes, in the course of detention the causal link with the conviction itself may become increasingly remote from the objectives of the legislature or the court, and may thereby become unreasonable and arbitrary.¹²⁸

Non-compliance with a court order or legal obligation (art. 5(1)(b))

The second sub-paragraph of article 5(1) applies to detention resulting from a court order or from a legal obligation. Examples in the case law of the first limb of sub-paragraph (b), namely, detention pursuant to a court order, include failure to obey an order to pay a fine,¹²⁹ refusal to submit to a psychiatric examination¹³⁰ or to take a blood test,¹³¹ failure to respect residence restrictions,¹³² failure to return children to the custodial parent,¹³³ failure to agree to make an undertaking not to breach the peace ('binding over order'),¹³⁴ breach of bail conditions,¹³⁵ and confinement in a psychiatric hospital.¹³⁶ In such cases, the individual must have had an opportunity to comply with the court order but have failed to do so, or defied it.¹³⁷ Necessarily, the individual cannot be detained if he or she has not been informed of the order.¹³⁸

The second limb of article 5(1)(b) concerns failure to submit to a legal obligation. Examples include a refusal to provide identification when requested,¹³⁹ to submit to a security check at an international border,¹⁴⁰ to leave an area when so ordered by police,¹⁴¹ questioning at a police station,¹⁴² and to appear at a court hearing.¹⁴³ The obligation must be 'specific and concrete'.¹⁴⁴ The Convention organs have consistently rejected a broad interpretation by which article 5(1)(b) is invoked to justify internment or administrative detention for the purpose of compelling a person to comply with general obligations arising from the law.¹⁴⁵ The State cannot rely upon a vague duty not to commit a criminal offence in the imminent future. However, an order to keep the peace will be valid if specific measures have been prescribed and these have not been observed¹⁴⁶ or if the individual is required to make clear and positive steps that indicate the obligation will not be complied with,¹⁴⁷ provided that 'the place and time of the imminent commission of the offence and its potential victim(s) have been sufficiently specified'.¹⁴⁸

The arrest and detention must be truly necessary for the purpose of fulfilment of the obligation. In assessing a justification for deprivation of liberty, a fair balance has to be struck between the significance in a democratic society of securing the fulfilment of the obligation in issue and the importance of the right to liberty. Relevant factors are the nature and the purpose of the obligation, the detained person, the specific circumstances that led to his or her detention, and the length of the detention.¹⁴⁹ For example, if a witness fails to appear for questioning without a good reason, he or she may be detained in order to be brought before the investigator or the court. Nevertheless, 'the decision-making process in such matters, where the person's liberty is at stake, should not be overly formalistic, and should take into account all relevant circumstances of the case. Thus, the same reason (a business trip, an illness, a family event, etc.) may be a valid excuse in one context and not in another'.¹⁵⁰

The detention will only be acceptable if it 'cannot be fulfilled by milder means'.¹⁵¹ Detention is permitted only in order to 'secure the fulfilment' of the obligation. It must not be punitive in nature.¹⁵² The obligation itself must be compatible with the Convention.¹⁵³ Once the obligation is fulfilled the justification for detention ceases to exist.¹⁵⁴

In assessing the proportionality of the detention, account will be taken of the length of time the person is held.¹⁵⁵

Detention for criminal prosecution (art. 5(1)(c))

Sub-paragraph (c) of article 5(1) governs detention for the purpose of bringing a person before a competent legal authority who is suspected of having committed an offence. Necessarily, it is only applicable in criminal proceedings.¹⁵⁶ Article 5(1)(c) has a 'close affinity' with article 3 in terms of the relevant principles.¹⁵⁷ Three distinct grounds are set out for detention under this paragraph: where there is reasonable suspicion that an offence has been committed; when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent the person committing an offence; when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent the person fleeing after having committed an offence. Thus, 'the expression "effected for purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority" qualifies every category of cases of arrest or detention referred to in that sub-paragraph'.¹⁵⁸

The term 'competent legal authority', described in one judgment as being 'rather vague' and in 'abbreviated form',¹⁵⁹ has the same meaning as 'judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power' in article 5(3).¹⁶⁰ To constitute a 'competent legal authority', the institution must have the power to order release.¹⁶¹

Having a 'reasonable suspicion' means that there must be 'facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned may have committed the offence'.¹⁶² The meaning of 'reasonable' will depend upon all the circumstances.¹⁶³ This is not a particularly high threshold and is certainly not comparable to what is necessary to warrant a conviction or even to bring a charge, issues that arise at subsequent stages in the criminal investigation and trial process.¹⁶⁴ Accordingly, there is no violation of article 5(1)(c) simply because after the arrest and detention the authorities do not then press charges. There may be many explanations for a failure to proceed, including unavailability or likely inadmissibility of evidence, or the need to protect the lives of others.¹⁶⁵ Nevertheless, article 5(1)(c) will be breached if there is a failure by the authorities to make a genuine inquiry into the basic facts of the case in order to verify if a complaint is well founded.¹⁶⁶ There can be no 'reasonable suspicion' if the acts attributed to the detained person were not an offence at the time of their commission.¹⁶⁷ The production of evidence with the possibility of it being examined and challenged by the detained person is an important safeguard against arbitrary arrest.¹⁶⁸ In a case where detention of demonstrators was justified on the grounds that they had insulted police officers and resisted arrest, but where a video of the events showed this to be a false accusation, the Court said there could be no 'reasonable suspicion' and that consequently the detention was not 'lawful'.¹⁶⁹

In justifying the reasonableness of arrest and detention, the State may confront particular difficulties in terrorism and organized crime cases, where confidential information cannot be disclosed. However, 'the exigencies of dealing with terrorist crime cannot justify stretching the notion of "reasonableness" to the point where the safeguard secured by Article 5 § 1 (c) is impaired'.¹⁷⁰ In an organized crime case, uncorroborated hearsay evidence from an anonymous informant did not meet the 'reasonable suspicion' requirement.¹⁷¹

The term 'offence' has the same meaning as 'criminal offence' in article 6. It must be 'specific and concrete'.¹⁷² Although article 5(1)(c) authorizes arrest and detention to prevent commission of an offence, this phrase cannot be taken to allow a policy of general prevention directed against an individual or a category of individuals who, like mafiosi, present a danger on account of their continuing propensity to crime.¹⁷³ Such an interpretation is confirmed by the use of the word 'offence' (in French, celle-ci) in the singular¹⁷⁴ as well as by the general purpose of article 5, which is to ensure that no person is dispossessed of liberty in an arbitrary fashion.¹⁷⁵ A practice in Ukraine of holding defendants in custody solely because a bill of indictment has been submitted to the trial court, with the consequence that they may be deprived of liberty indefinitely without any judicial authorization, has been deemed to lack certainty and violate the norm against arbitrariness.¹⁷⁶

Detention pursuant to article 5(1)(c) involves a proportionality requirement.¹⁷⁷ The Court may consider whether detention in custody is strictly necessary or whether presence at trial can be ensured using less stringent measures sufficient for such a purpose.¹⁷⁸ In assessing the risk of flight should the person be released pending trial, the Court considers the relevance of a broad range of factors, including a person's character, morals, home, occupation, assets, and family ties, as well as the expected length of the sentence and the weight of evidence.¹⁷⁹

Minors (art. 5(1)(d))

The fourth category of permissible deprivation of liberty concerns minors. They may be detained on two grounds: for the purpose of educational supervision; or for the purpose of bringing the minor before the competent legal authority. Paragraph (d) has been described as 'a specific, but not exhaustive, example of circumstances in which minors might be detained'.¹⁸⁰ Obviously, minors may also be detained pursuant to the other subparagraphs of article 5(1).¹⁸¹ The term 'minor' has been held to encompass persons under the age of eighteen.¹⁸² The European Commission, in a 1979 decision, considered that an adolescent of sixteen was a 'minor' for the purposes of article 5(1), noting that none of the States Parties to the Convention had an age of majority lower than eighteen.¹⁸³ But this is no longer the case since 1991, when Scotland set the age of majority at sixteen.¹⁸⁴

Detention for the purpose of 'educational supervision' may be given a very broad reading, in effect providing the state with justification for compulsory attendance at school, which obviously amounts to a deprivation of liberty. Indeed, human rights law requires States to ensure compulsory education at the primary level. The words 'educational supervision' should not be 'equated rigidly with notions of classroom teaching. Such supervision must embrace many aspects of the exercise, by the authority, of parental rights for the benefit and protection of the person concerned'.¹⁸⁵

Sub-paragraph (d) applies to all minors and not only persons below the official school leaving age. The fact that an individual can no longer be required to attend ordinary school does not prevent a detention order being made to the extent that it is 'for the purpose of educational supervision'.¹⁸⁶ Where an adolescent was detained in order to prevent her from obtaining an abortion, the Court held that article 5(1)(d) could not apply because 'by no stretch of the imagination can the detention be considered to have been ordered for educational supervision'.¹⁸⁷ Nor did the Court consider detention in a penal facility where educational activities were entirely voluntary and optional as being 'for the purpose of educational supervision'.¹⁸⁸

The Court has considered that a juvenile holding facility, where adolescents were temporarily detained for various reasons including criminal prosecution, did not amount to 'educational supervision' and that therefore sub-paragraph (d) was inapplicable.¹⁸⁹ But the words 'for the purpose of' indicate that confinement of a juvenile in a remand prison does not necessarily breach sub-paragraph (d), even if it is not specifically directed at 'educational supervision' to the extent that it is a means of ensuring that the minor is placed under 'educational supervision'. In other words, sub-paragraph (d) 'does not preclude an interim custody measure being used as a preliminary to a regime of supervised education, without itself involving any supervised education'. However, any such imprisonment 'must be speedily followed by actual application of such a regime in a setting (open or closed) designed and with sufficient resources for the purpose'.¹⁹⁰

Under the second limb of sub-paragraph (d), detention of a minor may be authorized in order to bring him or her before the competent legal authority.

Medical or social reasons (art. 5(1)(e))

Medical and social reasons may justify the restriction on liberty of individuals, including their detention. Article 5(1)(e) enables detention in a general sense with respect to medical or social reasons. It provides an enumeration of several categories of persons: those spreading infectious diseases, persons of unsound mind, alcoholics, drug addicts, and vagrants. There is an assumption implied in the provision that such persons may be deprived of their liberty either in order to be given medical treatment or because of considerations dictated by social policy, or on both medical and social grounds.¹⁹¹ According to the Court, the Convention allows such individuals, 'all of whom are socially maladjusted', to be deprived of their liberty both because 'they have to be considered as occasionally dangerous for public safety but also [because] their own interests may necessitate their detention'.¹⁹²

The first ground for detention listed in the sub-paragraph is prevention of the spreading of infectious diseases. In determining the lawfulness of such detention, there are two main criteria: spreading of the disease must be dangerous to public health or safety; and measures less severe than detention must have been considered and been found to be insufficient to safeguard the public interest.¹⁹³

'Persons of unsound mind' is the second category for which detention is authorized under article 5(1)(e) of the Convention. In the application of this provision, the Court applies what are sometimes called 'Winterwerp criteria', after the case in which they were set out: the person must reliably be shown to be of unsound mind; the mental disorder must be of a kind or degree warranting confinement without consent; and the continued validity of detention depends upon the persistence of the disorder.¹⁹⁴ Although the term 'person of unsound mind' evades precise definition, it cannot be used to permit detention of someone simply because his or her views or behaviour deviate from established norms.¹⁹⁵ National authorities are given a margin of discretion in deciding whether a person is 'of unsound mind'.¹⁹⁶ Nevertheless, if it is to show deference to the national authorities, 'the Court must be satisfied that they have assessed and scrutinised the pertinent issues thoroughly. These principles are fully applicable to situations of deprivation of liberty, given the fundamental importance of this right in a democratic society.'¹⁹⁷ Detention pursuant to sub-paragraph (e) should not be confused with detention for the purpose of a psychiatric examination, which is governed by sub-paragraph (b).¹⁹⁸

Detention of a person by reason of 'unsound mind' may be necessary not only to provide clinical treatment in order to address the condition but also to provide control and supervision, and in order to prevent the individual from causing harm.¹⁹⁹ In making the assessment, the relevant point in time for the purposes of article 5(1)(e) is the date when the measure depriving the person of liberty is adopted.²⁰⁰ Evaluating whether the medical evidence indicates recovery may take some time,²⁰¹ but continued deprivation of liberty for purely administrative reasons is not justified.²⁰² Detention of persons of unsound mind on the basis of article 5(1)(e) must take place in a hospital, clinic, or other suitable institution properly authorized for this purpose.²⁰³ It is permitted on a temporary basis to detain a person in an institution not specifically designed for persons of 'unsound mind', providing the waiting period for transfer to an appropriate facility is not excessive.²⁰⁴

The Court has considered that an 'alcoholic' need not be someone in a clinical state of alcoholism.²⁰⁵ The provision has been viewed broadly as permitting detention in order to prevent alcohol abuse and to prevent dangerous conduct by persons following the consumption of drink.²⁰⁶ On this point, the Court noted that when the Convention was being drafted, the Committee of Experts 'had no doubt that this could be agreed "since such restrictions were justified by the requirements of public morality and order"'.²⁰⁷ According to the Court, not only may the harmful use of alcohol represent a danger to society, 'a person who is in a state of intoxication may pose a danger to himself and others, regardless of whether or not he is addicted to alcohol'.²⁰⁸ Where conduct and behaviour poses a threat to public order or to the individual concerned, article 5(1)(e) permits detention in order to protect both the public and the person who is abusing alcohol.²⁰⁹ Nevertheless, the Convention does not allow the detention of a person solely because of high alcohol intake.²¹⁰

The final category contemplated by article 5(1)(e) is 'vagrants'. This is a rather archaic provision, reflecting views that still prevailed in some parts of Western Europe in the late 1940s but that are almost certainly obsolete today. In an early case, the Court adopted three criteria derived from Belgian law: persons who have no fixed abode, no means of subsistence, and no regular trade or profession.²¹¹ In one of the few cases dealing with this concept, the Court ruled that Italy could not invoke 'vagrancy' in a case where it had imposed compulsory residence on an island for someone suspected of being a mafioso. The agent for Italy had described the applicant as 'a vagrant in the wide sense of the term' (vagabondo nel senso largo dell'espressione) and 'a monied vagrant' (vagabondo ricco), but the Court insisted that the exceptions allowed by article 5(1) required a narrow interpretation and held that there had been a violation of the Convention.²¹²

Detention to prevent entry or for expulsion and deportation (art. 5(1)(f))

Sub-paragraph (f) of article 5(1) permits States to arrest and detain persons in order to prevent unauthorized entry into the country and for the purposes of deportation or extradition. There is no doubt that the Convention allows States to control the liberty of aliens in an immigration context. States Parties to the Convention have an 'undeniable sovereign right to control aliens' entry into and residence in their territory'.²¹³ This necessarily implies that States may detain would-be immigrants who have applied for permission to enter, whether by way of asylum or not.²¹⁴

Unlike other sub-paragraphs of article 5(1), and notably article 5(1)(c), there is no requirement in article 5(1)(f) that detention be justified by protection of crime or public safety, or out of concern for the individual being detained. It does not demand that detention be considered reasonably necessary, for example to prevent the individual from committing an offence or fleeing.²¹⁵ All the provision requires is that detention be directed at preventing unauthorized entry or at removal from the country. It is therefore immaterial whether the underlying decision to expel can be justified under national or Convention law.²¹⁶ But where proceedings are not underway to expel or extradite a person, the exception of 5(1)(f) does not apply. Detention must be carried out in good faith, it must be closely connected to the purpose of preventing unauthorized entry, deportation, or extradition, the place and conditions of detention should be appropriate, and the length of the detention should not exceed that reasonably required for the purpose being pursued.²¹⁷ Deprivation of liberty in view of deportation or extradition can only be justified as long as proceedings are underway. If they are not conducted with due diligence, a violation of article 5(1)(f) may arise.²¹⁸

The Court has spoken of the two 'limbs' of article 5(1)(f), the first concerning prevention of unauthorized entry, and the second governing removal of persons already on the territory. The principle that detention should not be arbitrary applies to detention under the first limb of article 5(1)(f) in the same manner as it applies to detention under the second limb.²¹⁹ When the first limb of article 5(1)(f) is concerned, in determining the place and conditions of detention the State must bear in mind 'that the measure is applicable not to those who have committed criminal offences but to aliens who, often fearing for their lives, have fled from their own country'.²²⁰ Detention under the second limb of article 5(1)(f) may be justified by enquiries from the competent authorities, even if a formal request or an order of extradition has not been issued. Such enquiries may be considered 'actions' taken for the purpose of removal.²²¹

The Convention does not prescribe the circumstances for which extradition may be granted or the procedure to be followed. It does not prevent international judicial cooperation between States, and notably extradition for the purposes of bringing fugitive suspects to justice, provided that there is no interference with specific rights recognized by the Convention.²²² In exceptional circumstances, problems may arise, for example where deportation amounts to a disguised form of extradition designed to circumvent a domestic court ruling denying extradition.²²³

In expulsion cases, the Court sometimes requests a stay pending its determination of the merits, given the potential for irreversible harm. Such provisional measures requests are not relevant to the issue of the legality of detention under article 5(1).²²⁴ The fact that the Court's interim measures request blocks the expulsion does not make the detention itself irregular, provided that the authorities continue to seek expulsion and the detention itself is not unreasonably prolonged.²²⁵

Information on reasons for arrest (art. 5(2))

A person who is arrested must be informed promptly, in a language that he or she understands, of the reasons for arrest and of any charges that have been made. Article 9(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights formulates the norm slightly differently: 'Anyone who is arrested shall be informed, at the time of arrest, of the reasons for his arrest and shall be promptly informed of any charges against him.' The right to be informed is an 'elementary safeguard' that constitutes 'an integral part of the scheme of protection afforded by Article 5'. The arrested person 'must be told, in simple, non-technical language that he can understand, the essential legal and factual grounds for his arrest, so as to be able, if he sees fit, to apply to a court to challenge its lawfulness in accordance with paragraph 4'.²²⁶

Use of the terms 'arrested' and 'charge' in article 5(2) implies that the text belongs to a criminal law context. It might be argued that the scope of article 5(2) is confined to situations of detention contemplated by article 5(1)(c). However, unlike article 5(3), which explicitly applies to article 5(1)(c), article 5(2) has no such formal limitation. The Court has held that article 5(2) should be interpreted 'autonomously' so as to extend the notion of 'arrest' beyond the realm of criminal law. Applying a purposive approach, the Court said that in using the words 'any charge', 'the intention of the drafters was not to lay down a condition for its applicability, but to indicate an eventuality of which it takes account'.²²⁷ It did not in fact refer to the travaux préparatoires for evidence of the drafters' intent and instead turned to the text of article 5 itself in order to support its interpretation. The Court noted that article 5(4) was not confined to criminal law situations, and that one of the objectives of article 5(2) was to enable a detained person to exercise the right to challenge detention in accordance with article 5(4).²²⁸ Article 5(2) has been applied in cases of detention for medical reasons,²²⁹ extradition,²³⁰ expulsion,²³¹ and conditional release from prison.²³²

The information, as article 5(2) makes abundantly clear, must be provided to the individual or to his or her representative.²³³ Whether the content and promptness of the information conveyed are sufficient is to be assessed in each case according to its special features.²³⁴ The information need not be related in its entirety by the arresting officer at the very moment of the arrest.²³⁵ Nor is a complete list of the charges against the arrested person required by article 5(2).²³⁶ But 'a bare indication of the legal basis for an arrest cannot, taken on its own, be sufficient'.²³⁷ There is no requirement that the reasons be in writing or in any special form.²³⁸ This is especially true in the case of arrest for purposes of extradition, where the reasons may be even more summary than in the case of arrest for criminal prosecution.²³⁹ This is because a challenge to extradition does not involve contestation of the charges as such.²⁴⁰ But whatever the nature of the proceedings, the arrested person must receive information sufficient to enable recourse pursuant to article 5(4).²⁴¹

Reasons for arrest may be provided or become apparent in the course of interrogation or questioning following the arrest.²⁴² An arrested person cannot claim not to have understood the reasons for arrest when this is apparent from the circumstances.²⁴³ In the Abdullah Öcalan case, the Court said that because of the notoriety of the proceedings against him coupled with the illegal nature under Turkish law of the organisation in question, 'the applicant must or should already have been aware at that juncture that he was being arrested for his activities as the leader of a banned organisation, the PKK'.²⁴⁴ If the warrant of arrest is written in a language that the accused does not understand, the requirements of article 5(2) are complied with if the person is subsequently interrogated and informed of the reasons for arrest in a language that is understood.²⁴⁵ If the authorities use translators for this purpose, they must make sure that requests for translation are formulated with meticulousness and precision.²⁴⁶

As with the content of the information, the promptness of its delivery is also assessed in each case according to its special features.²⁴⁷ The information must be provided 'promptly' (in French, dans le plus court délai).²⁴⁸ The term 'promptly' is also used in article 5(3), where the Court has distinguished it from the 'the less strict requirement' of 'reasonable time' (délai raisonnable) as well as that of 'speedily' (à bref délai) with respect to a challenge to detention pursuant to article 5(4).²⁴⁹ The temporal requirements are met if the arrested person is informed of the reasons within 'a few hours'.²⁵⁰

Prompt appearance before judicial authorities (art. 5(3))

Article 5(3) requires that persons arrested or detained in accordance with article 5(1)(c) must be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power. Thus, this requirement applies to those for whom the arrest and detention are associated with prosecution within the criminal justice system and not to the other categories of detention set out in the subparagraphs of article 5(1). The provision entitles persons arrested or detained on suspicion of having committed a criminal offence to a guarantee against any arbitrary or unjustified deprivation of liberty.²⁵¹ Article 5(3) imposes two conditions: prompt access to a judicial authority and consideration by the judicial authority of the merits of the detention. Article 5(1)(c) and article 5(3) are closely associated. The Court has noted that article 5(3) 'forms a whole with paragraph 1 (c)'.²⁵² But article 5(3) is neither a 'constituent element' of article 5(1)(c) nor a lex specialis. It enshrines a specific right applicable to cases that fall under article 5(1)(c), namely to be brought promptly before a judge.²⁵³

Access to a court in order to supervise deprivation of liberty by the State is an essential feature of the guarantee set out in article 5(3).²⁵⁴ By requiring judicial control or supervision of any detention by the authorities, article 5(3) affirms the centrality of the rule of law. Reference here is made to the Preamble of the Convention, where there is express reference to the rule of law as 'one of the fundamental principles of a democratic society' from which 'the whole Convention draws its inspiration'.²⁵⁵ The Court has associated the procedural requirement set out in article 5(3) with the non-derogability of the prohibition of ill-treatment.²⁵⁶ Article 5(3) does not allow any exceptions to the requirement of prompt appearance before a judicial authority,²⁵⁷ although derogation from the provision in accordance with article 15(1) of the Convention cannot be ruled out. The right of an accused in detention to have the case examined with particular expedition 'must not unduly hinder the efforts of the judicial authorities to carry out their tasks with proper care'.²⁵⁸

The structure of article 5(3) relates to two separate and distinct matters: 'the early stages following an arrest when an individual is taken into the power of the authorities and the period pending eventual trial before a criminal court during which the suspect may be detained or released with or without conditions'.²⁵⁹ The two limbs of article 5(3) confer distinct rights and are not linked either logically or temporally.²⁶⁰ The right to appear before a judicial authority has been referred to in the case law as 'the opening part of article 5(3)'.²⁶¹ The Court has explained that this judicial control 'serves to provide effective safeguards against the risk of ill-treatment, which is at its greatest in this early stage of detention, and against the abuse of powers bestowed on law enforcement officers or other authorities for what should be narrowly restricted purposes and exercisable strictly in accordance with prescribed procedures'.²⁶²

Judicial control upon arrest or detention must be automatic.²⁶³ It does not depend upon a demand by the person who is arrested and detained.²⁶⁴ In this respect, it is distinct from the right to challenge detention recognized in article 5(4), whose exercise depends upon the initiative of the person detained or of someone acting on his or her behalf.²⁶⁵ The automatic nature of the review assured by article 5(3) 'is necessary to fulfil the purpose of the paragraph, as a person subjected to ill-treatment might be incapable of lodging an application asking for a judge to review their detention'.²⁶⁶ This may also be relevant 'for other vulnerable categories of arrested persons, such as the mentally weak or those who do not speak the language of the judicial officer'.²⁶⁷

The review of detention must be 'prompt'. Prompt judicial review of detention is an important safeguard against ill-treatment of the individual who has been taken into custody.²⁶⁸ The strict time constraint imposed by article 5(3) provides 'little flexibility in interpretation, otherwise there would be a serious weakening of a procedural guarantee to the detriment of the individual and the risk of impairing the very essence of the right protected by this provision'.²⁶⁹ There are two references to celerity in article 5(3). The Court has noted the distinction between the term 'promptly' (in French, aussitôt) in article 5(3) and 'the less strict requirement' of 'reasonable time' (délai raisonnable) in terms of being brought to trial, as well as that of 'speedily' (à bref délai) with respect to a challenge to detention pursuant to article 5(4).²⁷⁰ The term 'promptly' (dans le plus court délai) also appears in article 5(2). According to the Court, '[t]he use in the French text of the word "aussitôt", with its constraining connotation of immediacy, confirms that the degree of flexibility attaching to the notion of "promptness" is limited, even if the attendant circumstances can never be ignored for the purposes of the assessment under paragraph 3'.²⁷¹ In the case law of the Convention organs, a period of four days in detention without appearance before a judge appears to be the maximum that can be tolerated under article 5(3).²⁷² But periods of less than four days may also be considered unacceptable if the State cannot demonstrate special difficulties or exceptional circumstances that explain why the individual could not appear before judicial authorities any sooner.²⁷³

The expression 'judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power' (in French, un juge ou un autre magistrat habilité par la loi à exercer des fonctions judiciaires) has been held to have the same meaning as 'competent legal authority' in article 5(1)(c).²⁷⁴ The term 'judicial power' is broad enough to encompass officials in public prosecution departments as well as sitting judges.²⁷⁵ It has been noted that the term magistrat in the

French version and 'even more "officer" in English manifestly have a wider meaning than "juge" and "judge"'.²⁷⁶ The Court has noted that many European States recognize such authority to les magistrats du parquet who are associated with the office of the public prosecutor as well as full-fledged juges du siège.²⁷⁷ What is important is that the officer be independent and impartial.²⁷⁸ The officer must have the power to order release.²⁷⁹ In determining whether the officer meets the requirements of article 5(3), the Court has stressed the importance of 'formal, visible requirements stated in the "law"' as opposed to standard practices.²⁸⁰ The 'judge or other officer' must be independent of the executive and the parties in the same manner as a tribunal within the meaning of article 6(1) of the Convention.²⁸¹

Use of the word 'brought' indicates that the 'officer' is required by article 5(3) to conduct a hearing before taking the appropriate decision.²⁸² The Court has explained that the procedural requirements of article 5 are 'more flexible' than those of article 6. This is because detention proceedings 'require special expedition'. Consequently, 'Article 5 does not contain any explicit mention of a right to legal assistance' and 'as a rule, the judge may decide not to wait until a detainee avails himself of legal assistance, and the authorities are not obliged to provide him with free legal aid in the context of the detention proceedings'.²⁸³ This does not mean that a judge is entitled to exclude counsel from the article 5(3) proceeding if the detained person already has retained counsel.²⁸⁴

The officer or judge is required to consider the merits of the detention.²⁸⁵ The review itself must be able to examine the issue of 'lawfulness' and whether there is a reasonable suspicion that the arrested or detained person committed an offence (that is, whether it falls within the terms of article 5(1)(c)).²⁸⁶ It must also consider whether the detention itself is justifiable.²⁸⁷

The Court has said it is both 'good practice' and 'highly desirable in order to minimise delay' that the judicial officer conducting the automatic review prescribed by article 5(3) is also empowered to consider release on bail. This is not a requirement of the Convention, however. There can be two separate procedures conducted by different judicial officers providing that the requirement of promptness is respected.²⁸⁸

Trial within reasonable time or release pending trial (art. 5(3))

The second limb of article 5(3) requires that a person arrested and detained pursuant to article 5(1)(c), that is, for the purpose of criminal proceedings, be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial. The text might be read to suggest that the authorities are free to choose between speedy trial or release, but article 5(3) has not been interpreted so as to allow such an option.²⁸⁹ The person accused can only be detained pending trial if the State can demonstrate that there are 'relevant and sufficient' reasons for this.²⁹⁰ Even the shortest period of detention requires convincing justification.²⁹¹

In making the determination under article 5(3), the relevant time period begins when the person is taken into custody and ends with a decision on the merits of the charge, even if this is only at first instance.²⁹² Article 5(3) ceases to apply once a person has been convicted. Then, the individual can no longer be regarded as being detained 'for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence'. Once he or she is convicted at trial, the person falls under the scope of article 5(1)(a), where deprivation of liberty 'after conviction by a competent court' is authorized.²⁹³

The settled case law of the Court establishes a presumption under Article 5 in favour of release.²⁹⁴ This flows from the presumption of innocence and applies until conviction. The equivalent provision in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, article 9(3), is more explicit in this respect, stating that '[i]t shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody'. According to the Court, 'the purpose of the provision under consideration is essentially to require his provisional release once his continuing detention ceases to be reasonable'.²⁹⁵ For this reason, '[c]ontinued detention therefore can be justified in a given case only if there are specific indications of a genuine requirement of public interest which, notwithstanding the presumption of innocence, outweighs the rule of respect for individual liberty laid down in Article 5 of the Convention'.²⁹⁶

Pre-trial detention of minors is to be used only as a last resort. Where deemed strictly necessary, it should be as short as possible. Detained minors are to be kept separate from adults.²⁹⁷ In this respect, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides an explicit guarantee, something lacking in the European Convention.²⁹⁸ The Convention on the Rights of the Child is similar in scope.²⁹⁹ The Court has also referred to relevant principles in the European Prison Rules.³⁰⁰

The case law recognizes four grounds to refuse bail or interim release. The first is the risk that the accused will fail to appear for trial. The possibility that the accused person would abscond if released pending trial must be assessed in light of a number of relevant factors. The gravity of the possible sentence in the event of conviction cannot be the sole criterion in making such a determination.³⁰¹ The existence and persistence of 'serious indications of guilt' is certainly a relevant factor to be considered.³⁰² Although 'the state of evidence' may provide serious indications of guilt, it alone cannot justify lengthy pre-trial detention.³⁰³

Matters to be taken into account include the person's character, morals, home, occupation, assets, family ties, and various links with the country in which he is being prosecuted.³⁰⁴ In one case, the Court observed that the judicial orders authorizing detention on remand 'were based on a brief standard formula that the detention was justified, namely that the applicant had been previously convicted, did not have a place of residence, a job nor a family and that he could commit new offences, and abscond'.³⁰⁵ The Court held that the mere absence of a fixed residence is insufficient to conclude the existence of a real risk of non-appearance. 'Nor can it be concluded from the lack of a job or a family that a person is inclined to commit new offences', it said, adding that there were doubts that the reasons for detention, 'as reflected in the perfunctorily reasoned court orders, retained their sufficiency for the whole period of the pre-trial detention'.³⁰⁶ The Court has reasoned that 'the danger of flight necessarily decreases as the time spent in detention passes by for the probability that the length of detention on remand will be deducted from the period of imprisonment which the person concerned may expect if convicted, is likely to make the prospect seem less awesome to him and reduce his temptation to flee'.³⁰⁷

The other grounds for denying interim release concern the possibility that if allowed to be at liberty the accused person might take action to prejudice the administration of justice, commit further offences, or cause public disorder.³⁰⁸ The danger that the detained person will hinder the proper conduct of the proceedings if released must be supported by factual evidence.³⁰⁹ Any justification of detention based upon the requirements of the investigation will diminish with the passage of time.³¹⁰ If the possibility that further offences will be committed is relied upon, this must be plausible in light of the circumstances of the case and the history and personality of the suspect and not purely automatic.³¹¹ Previous convictions may indicate a risk that further offences will be perpetrated.³¹² Lack of a job or family does not suggest a propensity to re-offend.³¹³ Preservation of public order may be taken into account in exceptional circumstances, but only where it can be shown that release of the accused would actually pose a threat.³¹⁴

Although reasonable suspicion that the detained person has committed an offence is 'a condition sine qua non for the lawfulness of the continued detention' at the preliminary stages, with the passage of time it is no longer sufficient. The Court must then establish if the other grounds given by the judicial authorities of the State continue to justify the deprivation of liberty. In justifying detention, the national judicial authorities must examine all of the relevant facts, setting them out in their decisions on the applications for release.³¹⁵ The Court will rely essentially on the reasons given by such decisions in determining whether article 5(3) has been respected.³¹⁶ If circumstances that could have warranted a person's detention may have existed but were not mentioned in the domestic decisions, 'it is not the Court's task to establish them and to take the place of the national authorities which ruled on the applicant's detention'.³¹⁷

Arguments for and against release must not be 'general and abstract'.³¹⁸ They must contain references to the specific facts and the applicant's personal circumstances justifying detention.³¹⁹ Even if such grounds are deemed to be 'relevant' and 'sufficient', the Court must nevertheless also be satisfied that the national authorities have displayed 'special diligence' in conducting the proceedings.³²⁰ The burden of proof cannot be reversed so as to require the detained person to show reasons justifying release.³²¹

In a Russian case, where detention prior to and during trial lasted more than twenty months, the national courts refused an application for release at least ten times, noting in each decision the gravity of the charges and the likelihood of flight, as well as concerns about obstructing the course of justice and of exerting pressure on witnesses. But the European Court explained that 'the judicial decisions did not go any further than listing these grounds, omitting to substantiate them with relevant and sufficient reasons. The Court also notes that with the passing of time the courts' reasoning did not evolve to reflect the developing situation and to verify whether these grounds remained valid at the advanced stage of the proceedings.' Also, at a certain point the decisions extending detention no longer established any time limits, implying that detention would continue until the end of the trial.³²² Any '[q]uasi-automatic prolongation of detention' contravenes article 5(3).³²³

Guarantees to appear for trial (art. 5(3))

The final sentence in paragraph 3 specifies that release may be conditioned upon guarantees to appear for trial. In deciding whether to release or detain an individual, the authorities must consider alternative methods of ensuring appearance at trial.³²⁴ Typically, such a guarantee involves a deposit of money or a bond. Such bail may be imposed only as long as the reasons justifying detention continue.³²⁵ To the extent that a justification for bail remains valid, the amount required is to be 'assessed principally in relation to the person concerned, his assets... in other words to the degree of confidence that is possible that the prospect of loss of security in the event of his non-appearance at a trial will act as a sufficient deterrent to dispel any wish on his part to abscond'.³²⁶ Because the purpose is not to ensure reparation for loss, but rather to compel the appearance of the accused, the amount is to be established principally 'by reference to [the accused], his assets and his relationship with the persons who are to provide the security, in other words to the degree of confidence that is possible that the prospect of loss of the security or of action against the guarantors in case of his non-appearance at the trial will act as a sufficient deterrent to dispel any wish on his part to abscond'.³²⁷ The amount that is set must be justified in the decision where bail is set.³²⁸ Any automatic refusal of bail established by law where there is no judicial control is a violation of article 5(3).³²⁹ texts in France and the United States during the late eighteenth century, habeas corpus had already been enshrined for centuries as a fundamental entitlement of the citizen. It was central to the rule of law in its affirmation of an entitlement to have detention reviewed by the courts.

It is the only distinct remedy provision set out in the European Convention. As such, '[a]rticle 5 § 4 provides a lex specialis in relation to the more general requirements of Article 13'.³³⁰ It gives a detained person a distinct right to seek judicial review of their detention.³³¹ Article 5(4) is not adjectival in that it does not depend upon a preliminary finding of a violation of article 5(1) of the Convention. These paragraphs are separate and autonomous. The right to review of detention may be violated even if the detention itself is lawful.³³²

The term 'lawfulness', which is related to the word 'lawful' used in all of the subparagraphs of article 5(1), refers to both the procedural and the substantive conditions. This means that 'the "lawfulness" of an "arrest or detention" has to be determined in the light not only of domestic law but also of the text of the Convention, the general principles embodied therein and the aim of the restrictions permitted' by article 5(1).³³³ Therefore, the review must be substantive as well as procedural. The person concerned must be able to obtain a review not only of the domestic procedural requirements, in order to ensure that the law has been observed in a more technical sense, but also of the grounds for the detention, including 'the reasonableness of the suspicion grounding the arrest and the legitimacy of the purpose pursued by the arrest and the ensuing detention'.³³⁴ The judicial review is not 'of such breadth as to empower the court, on all aspects of the case including questions of pure expediency, to substitute its own discretion for that of the decision-making authority'.³³⁵ But it must be 'wide enough to bear on those conditions which are essential for the lawful detention of a person according to Article 5 § 1'.³³⁶ The court contemplated by article 5(4) must be able to assess whether there is sufficient evidence to give rise to a reasonable suspicion that the detained person has committed an offence. The existence of such evidence is essential for the detention to be considered 'lawful'.³³⁷

The procedural fairness requirements under article 5(4) are flexible in that there is no 'uniform, unvarying standard to be applied irrespective of the context, facts and circumstances'.³³⁸ According to the Grand Chamber, it is not always necessary that the procedure required by article 5(4) 'be attended by the same guarantees as those required under Article 6 § 1 of the Convention for criminal or civil litigation', but they must have

'a judicial character and provide guarantees appropriate to the kind of deprivation of liberty in question'.³³⁹ The proceedings must be adversarial and 'equality of arms' must be ensured between the parties.³⁴⁰ If the State allows for appeal or review of the article 5(4) determination, the system must in principle accord to the detainee the same guarantees on appeal as at first instance.³⁴¹ The judicial review must be conducted by a 'court', although this does not necessarily need to be a classic court within the regular judicial system of a country.³⁴² This requires appropriate procedural guarantees and a satisfactory level of independence and impartiality with respect to the authorities.³⁴³ The court must also have the power to address thoroughly the illegality of the detention. Therefore, it must have the authority to order release. If it can only make a recommendation, the body does not amount to a 'court' within the meaning of article 5(4).³⁴⁴

There are differences in formulation between paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 5 that have led to suggestions that a hearing is not required in the latter case. Paragraph 3 speaks of the 'right to be brought before a judge or other officer', whereas paragraph 4 recognizes a 'right to take proceedings'. The Court has not insisted upon the need for a hearing before the judicial authority in all situations contemplated by article 5(1). Nevertheless, a hearing must take place when sub-paragraphs 5(1)(c) and 5(1)(e) are engaged. It is sufficient if the person concerned is present for the proceedings at first instance; it is not also necessary for the person to be present at an appeal hearing.³⁴⁵ This is because '[t]he opportunity for a detainee to be heard either in person or through some form of representation features among the fundamental guarantees of procedure applied in matters of deprivation of liberty'.³⁴⁶ Article 5(4) does not require that a detained person be heard every time he or she lodges an appeal against a decision extending detention. However, it should be possible to exercise the right to be heard at regular intervals.³⁴⁷

If a person is deprived of liberty as a result of conviction for an offence, the judgment imposing a sentence of detention constitutes the judicial determination required by article 5(4). This rule even applies to mandatory life sentences that are 'purely punitive in nature because of the gravity of the offence'.³⁴⁸ No separate review of legality of detention is required.³⁴⁹ Nevertheless, in the case of lengthy sentences of imprisonment, 'where the grounds justifying the person's deprivation of liberty are susceptible to change with the passage of time',³⁵⁰ there may be a justification in periodic review, bringing article 5(4) into play. In the case of discretionary life sentences imposed in the United Kingdom, the Court held that prisoners were entitled to test the legality of their detention 'at reasonable intervals'.³⁵¹ One reason is that 'factors of mental instability and dangerousness are susceptible to change over the passage of time and new issues of lawfulness may thus arise in the course of detention'.³⁵² However, article 5(4) cannot be taken to provide a right to release on parole.³⁵³

The requirement of judicial review does not extend to providing an appeal from a decision at first instance, nor does it necessitate a review of all aspects of the case so that the discretion of the original decision-maker can be substituted with that of the reviewing body.³⁵⁴ The appeal respecting detention need not address every issue raised by the applicant, but it must provide for consideration of concrete facts capable of putting in doubt the conditions that are essential for the 'lawfulness' of the detention.³⁵⁵ The notion of 'lawfulness' in paragraph 4 is the same as in paragraph 1 of article 5. Thus, the review is undertaken not only in light of requirements of domestic law, 'but also of the Convention, the general principles embodied therein and the aim of the restrictions permitted by Article 5 § 1'.³⁵⁶

The challenge to detention contemplated by article 5(4) must 'be decided speedily'.³⁵⁷ The word 'speedily' (in French, à bref délai) indicates a lesser degree of urgency than 'promptly' (aussitôt), the term used in article 5(3) in the context of appearance before a court upon arrest or detention.³⁵⁸ Whether the right to a speedy decision has been respected must be determined in the light of the circumstances of each case.³⁵⁹ When more than one level of jurisdiction is involved in the proceedings, an overall assessment of the time taken is necessary.³⁶⁰ The Court will begin its consideration of the celerity with the initial challenge to detention, which is often at the administrative level, and not when formal legal proceedings are taken.³⁶¹ The relevant time concludes with the final determination of legality of detention, including the appeal if this is possible.³⁶² This cannot be determined in the abstract³⁶³ but depends upon the circumstances of each case.³⁶⁴ Relevant circumstances include 'the complexity of the proceedings, their conduct by the domestic authorities and by the applicant and what was at stake for the latter'.³⁶⁵ Much of the analysis is similar to that undertaken with respect to the requirement of a speedy trial, with both types of proceedings taking into account the diligence of the authorities and any contributing factors attributable to the applicant or victim.³⁶⁶ But in the case of article 5(4), the requirements are more stringent ('strict standards').³⁶⁷ The urgency of remedies to challenge detention is underscored by the European Court's reluctance to accept excuses such as a judicial recess or excessive workload.³⁶⁸ Any prolonged period of time before a decision is taken will attract scrutiny.³⁶⁹ The European Court of Human Rights has considered a time period of seventeen days for the review of detention to be excessive.³⁷⁰ It held that twenty-six days for the appeal of a decision was too long.³⁷¹

By its very nature, detention may require periodic review, because an application for release that fails at one point may have more merit with the passage of time. Periodic review of detention on remand may be more frequent than in other situations,³⁷² given that the detained person benefits from the presumption of innocence.³⁷³

Detention cases sometimes raise issues of national security. The State authorities may not fully disclose to the individual concerned the information that is available to the decision-maker.³⁷⁴ The European Court has suggested that the unfairness in such a situation may be addressed through the use of special advocates.³⁷⁵ article 5. Consequently, article 5(5) presupposes a violation of one of the other provisions of article 5, 'either by a domestic authority or by the Convention institutions'.³⁷⁶ Effective enjoyment of the right to compensation must be ensured with a sufficient degree of certainty.³⁷⁷ Article 5(5) does not depend upon a finding by a domestic court that one of the paragraphs of article 5 has been breached.³⁷⁸

The Court found that Italian law allowing for compensation—whether the person had been judged to have been unlawfully detained or whether he or she had been acquitted—complied with the requirements of article 5(5).³⁷⁹ Ukrainian law allowing for compensation only in the case of an ultimate acquittal of a detained person or termination of the criminal proceedings on exonerative grounds was judged by the Court to violate article 5(5).³⁸⁰ Requiring someone whose claim for compensation had been ignored to reopen proceedings was deemed inconsistent with the provision.³⁸¹

States are free to make compensation dependent upon a demonstration by the victim that damage has resulted from the breach of article 5.³⁸² The Court has said that in the context of article 5(5), 'the status of "victim" may exist even where there is no damage, but there can be no question of "compensation" where there is no pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage to compensate'.³⁸³ Article 5(5) is respected even if there is no specific remedy, but where an ordinary action in damages against the authorities is possible.³⁸⁴ Nevertheless, the possibility of reparation through an ordinary damage suit must be realistic.³⁸⁵ Romania's failure to produce any evidence that such a remedy had been effective led the Court to conclude that article 5(5) had been breached.³⁸⁶

The right to compensation does not mean that an applicant is entitled to any particular amount,³⁸⁷ although it cannot be a trivial or derisory amount³⁸⁸ or an amount substantially less than awards in similar situations.³⁸⁹ States may make such an award dependent upon demonstration of actual damage.³⁹⁰ However, the Court has warned that an excessively formalist approach may have the consequence of denying compensation in a large number of cases.³⁹¹ Although the right to compensation may be broader than that of a financial nature, it does not extend to a right to secure termination of a deprivation of liberty, as this is governed by article 5(4).³⁹²

Discrimination

As with other provisions of the Convention, issues concerning arrest and detention may involve differential treatment and discrimination in violation of article 14 of the Convention. There have been many general allegations of discrimination in matters governed by article 5, although most have been determined by the Court to be unsubstantiated and have been dismissed at the admissibility stage. Certain principles emerge, mainly from cases involving conditional release or parole following imposition of a prison sentence. Recalling that article 5 does not guarantee a right to automatic parole of persons convicted of an offence,³⁹³ there is nevertheless no doubt that if procedures governing release operate in a discriminatory fashion, article 14 is engaged in conjunction with article 5.³⁹⁴

Noting that determinations of parole eligibility were essentially a 'risk assessment exercise', the Court said it could see no justification for a policy of treating prisoners serving determinate terms of less than 15 years, those serving indeterminate terms, and those serving life terms any differently. As a result, all three categories were in an 'analogous position' and thereby governed by article 14.³⁹⁵ British legislation requiring that prisoners serving indeterminate terms exceeding fifteen years obtain the approval of the Secretary of State, something not required for the other categories, was differential treatment lacking any objective justification and therefore contrary to article 14.³⁹⁶

Turkish legislation dealing with treasonous and 'anti-Turkish' conduct did not allow for parole eligibility until three-quarters of the sentence had been served, in contrast with the general rule applicable to ordinary crimes of eligibility after serving one-half the sentence. The Court said that the purpose of the legislation was to treat those convicted of such offences 'less favourably with regard to automatic parole', but deduced from that fact 'that the distinction is made not between different groups of people, but between different types of offence, according to the legislature's view of their gravity'. Therefore, it was not discrimination within the meaning of article 14.³⁹⁷

In a German case, social therapy treatments for the purposes of preparing inmates for release were denied to foreign prisoners who were awaiting expulsion upon completion of their prison sentences. The available therapists were considered to be not in a position to prepare prisoners for social integration in countries where they were not familiar with the living conditions.³⁹⁸ As a result, 'the applicant was treated differently compared to prisoners in a relevantly similar situation on grounds of his national origin in relation to the order for the execution of his preventive detention. He was denied a chance to fulfil essential preconditions for the domestic courts to conclude that the execution of the preventive detention order against him could be suspended and probation be granted.'³⁹⁹

A prisoner detained in a British prison but pursuant to conviction and sentence imposed by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia challenged the parole eligibility regulations applicable to his situation, which were different from those of other prisoners in the prison. Several countries in Europe and elsewhere have agreements with the International Criminal Tribunal by which they take responsibility for service of sentences within their national prisons. The Tribunal itself has no prison of its own for this purpose, although it retains authority over parole eligibility. The European Court of Human Rights said it was satisfied that there was a difference in treatment and that it related to 'other status' within the terms of article 14, namely that the applicant was a prisoner convicted by the International Criminal Tribunal, but it rejected the complaint because he was not in an 'analogous situation to those convicted by British courts'.⁴⁰⁰

It is not discrimination to provide a different detention regime for adults than for children. Admittedly, the treatment of the two categories is different, but there is an objective and reasonable justification in the protective rather than punitive nature of juvenile detention.⁴⁰¹

In the Ireland v. the United Kingdom inter-State case, the Court noted that extrajudicial powers of detention were only employed initially against persons suspected of IRA terrorism, although subsequently they were used, 'but to a far lesser extent', against so-called Loyalists associated with the Protestant majority.⁴⁰² The Court felt this could be explained by 'profound differences between Loyalist and Republican terrorism', the scale of those attributable to the former being 'minute' compared with those of the latter.⁴⁰³ Subsequently, there was a 'spectacular increase' in Loyalist terrorism, although the British did not react immediately by imposing similar measures to those they had used against the Republican terrorists. The British had denied that there was any difference in treatment, but the Court made the argument for them, holding that the aim of eliminating 'the most formidable organisation first of all' could be regarded as legitimate and not disproportionate.⁴⁰⁴

Reservations

Article 5 has been subject to many reservations. The majority of these have concerned the military discipline regime in force in certain countries, including Armenia,⁴⁰⁵ Azerbaijan,⁴⁰⁶

Spain made a reservation concerning military discipline at the time of reservation.⁴¹⁶ Then, some years later Spain informed the Council of Europe that the relevant legislation had been amended so as to reduce the duration of deprivation of liberty that can be applied without judicial intervention and increase the guarantees of persons during the preliminary investigation. Nevertheless, Spain also confirmed that it maintained its reservation to article 5. The revised reservation was formally deposited as an updated reservation on 23 May 2007. The Court has held Spain's reservation to be inapplicable to the disciplinary regime for the Civil Guard.⁴¹⁷

Switzerland formulated a reservation to article 5 stating that it 'shall not affect the operation of the cantonal legislation authorising the detention of certain categories of persons by decision of an administrative authority or cantonal provisions governing the procedure for placing a child or ward in an institution in accordance with federal legislation on paternal authority or guardianship'.⁴¹⁸ It was subsequently withdrawn.⁴¹⁹

Some States with criminal procedure systems that allow detention of suspects upon a determination by the prosecutor, without any judicial intervention, have formulated reservations. Lithuania made a temporary reservation to article 5(3) of the Convention, intended to remain in effect for one year, concerning detention of persons suspected of committing crimes pursuant to a decision of the prosecutor.⁴²⁰ Considering the validity of the reservation, the Court noted its 'linguistic flaws' but said it was sufficiently clear and precise.⁴²¹ The Russian Federation formulated a reservation to paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 5 with respect to procedure for the arrest and detention of persons suspected of committing a criminal offence.⁴²² It has been held to be compatible with the Convention⁴²³ but has also been subject to a restrictive interpretation.⁴²⁴ Ukraine made a similar reservation, declaring it to be of temporary effect, from 11 September 1997 until 28 June 2001.⁴²⁵

In proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights concerning its reservation to paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 5, the government of Ukraine explained that the purpose was to preserve the procedure governing arrest and detention on remand at the time of ratification. Pursuant to the existing procedure, arrest and detention was authorized by a public prosecutor. According to the government, it 'clearly intended to exclude arrest authorised by a judicial officer in the course of a pre-trial investigation from the scope of their obligations under Article 5 of the Convention and to preserve this situation until the amendments to the Code of Criminal Procedure had been introduced'.⁴²⁶ Eventually, the legislation was changed so that arrest and detention decisions can now only be made by a court. The European Court has ruled that the reservation was validly formulated, in accordance with article 57,⁴²⁷ but has refused to accept Ukraine's contention that the reservation applies not only to article 5(1) but also to article 5(3). It has noted the distinction with the other Ukrainian reservation, concerning procedure before the military justice system, where express reference is made to article 5(3). Consequently, the Court has held that no reservation has been made to article 5(3) concerning judicial review of detention, aside from the reservation concerning the military justice system.⁴²⁸

Andorra made a reservation to article 5, stating that it applied without prejudice to a provision of its constitution: 'Police custody shall take no longer than the time needed to carry out the enquiries in relation to the clarification of the case, and in all cases the detained shall be brought before the judge within 48 hours.'

Austria ratified the Convention with a reservation to article 5 concerning deprivation of liberty prescribed by legislation concerning administrative procedure.⁴²⁹ It has been upheld in several decisions of the Convention organs.⁴³⁰

Serbia and Montenegro made a reservation to paragraphs 1(c) and 3 concerning its legislation whereby detention is mandatory if a person is under reasonable suspicion regarding an offence subject to imprisonment for forty years.⁴³¹ Serbia and Montenegro also made a reservation to article 5 declaring that it was subject to its legislation governing minor offences, although the statement did not make it clear what the precise problem was. The declaration stated that the reservation would be withdrawn as soon as the legislation was amended.⁴³² In 2011, Serbia withdrew the reservation to article 5.⁴³³

Andorra made a reservation with respect to legislation specifying that '[p]olice custody shall take no longer than the time needed to carry out enquiries in relation to the clarification of the case, and in all cases the detainee shall be brought before the judge within 48 hours'.⁴³⁴

Article 6. Right to a fair trial/Droit à un procès équitable

1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.

2. Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.

3. Everyone charged with a criminal offence has the following minimum rights:

- (a) to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him;
- (b) to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence;
- (c) to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require;
- (d) to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;
- (e) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court.

1. Toute personne a droit à ce que sa cause soit entendue équitablement, publiquement et dans un délai raisonnable, par un tribunal indépendant et impartial, établi par la loi, qui décidera, soit des contestations sur ses droits et obligations de caractère civil, soit du bien-fondé de toute accusation en matière pénale dirigée contre elle. Le jugement doit être rendu publiquement, mais l'accès de la salle d'audience peut être interdit à la presse et au public pendant la totalité ou une partie du procès dans l'intérêt de la moralité, de l'ordre public ou de la sécurité nationale dans une société démocratique, lorsque les intérêts des mineurs ou la protection de la vie privée des parties au procès l'exigent, ou dans la mesure jugée strictement nécessaire par le tribunal, lorsque dans des circonstances spéciales la publicité serait de nature à porter atteinte aux intérêts de la justice.

2. Toute personne accusée d'une infraction est présumée innocente jusqu'à ce que sa culpabilité ait été légalement établie.

3. Tout accusé a droit notamment à:

- (a) être informé, dans le plus court délai, dans une langue qu'il comprend et d'une manière détaillée, de la nature et de la cause de l'accusation portée contre lui;
- (b) disposer du temps et des facilités nécessaires à la préparation de sa défense;
- (c) se défendre lui-même ou avoir l'assistance d'un défenseur de son choix et, s'il n'a pas les moyens de rémunérer un défenseur, pouvoir être assisté gratuitement par un avocat d'office, lorsque les intérêts de la justice l'exigent;
- (d) interroger ou faire interroger les témoins à charge et obtenir la convocation et l'interrogation des témoins à décharge dans les mêmes conditions que les témoins à charge;
- (e) se faire assister gratuitement d'un interprète, s'il ne comprend pas ou ne parle pas la langue employée à l'audience.

Introductory comments

The right to a fair trial is important in and of itself. But it is also quite central to the enforcement and vindication of the other fundamental rights. The 'rule of law', which is set out in the Preamble to the Convention and which is central to its vision, cannot exist if there is no fair trial. The European Court has often spoken of 'the prominent place held in a democratic society by the right to a fair trial'.¹

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides for the right to a fair trial in two provisions, articles 10 and 11:

Article 10

Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

Article 11

- (1) Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.
- (2) No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offence was committed.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognizes the difference between civil or administrative ('rights and obligations') and criminal trials, something that corresponds to a distinction familiar to most if not all legal systems. Article 10 applies to both categories, whereas article 11 is only applicable to a person charged with a 'penal offence'. The distinction between civil or administrative proceedings and the criminal trial is maintained in the European Convention on Human Rights but with some modification in the presentation. Paragraphs 1 of articles 10 and 11 become the two first paragraphs of article 6, while paragraph 2 of article 11 becomes a distinct provision, article 7. Moreover, in the third paragraph of article 6 of the Convention a new concept is introduced of somewhat detailed minimum guarantees applicable in a criminal trial.

This detailed codification of minimum guarantees in a criminal trial was further developed in article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, where additional rights to those in the European Convention on Human Rights were set out. In turn, the Council of Europe incorporated most of these additional rights by means of Protocol No. 7 to the European Convention.

Article 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union guarantees the right to a fair trial in the following terms:

Article 47. Right to an effective remedy and to a fair trial

Everyone whose rights and freedoms guaranteed by the law of the Union are violated has the right to an effective remedy before a tribunal in compliance with the conditions laid down in this Article.

Everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal previously established by law. Everyone shall have the possibility of being advised, defended and represented.

Legal aid shall be made available to those who lack sufficient resources in so far as such aid is necessary to ensure effective access to justice.

The second and third paragraphs of article 47 of the European Charter correspond to article 6(1) of the Convention, but the limitation to the determination of civil rights and obligations or criminal charges does not apply as regards Union law and its implementation,² as has been noted by the Grand Chamber.³ Article 47 is meant to have the same meaning and scope as paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 6 of the European Convention.⁴

Drafting of the provision

The initial draft European Convention on Human Rights prepared by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement did not contain a provision that in any way resembles the fair trial guarantees set out in article 6.⁵ This seems surprising given the recognition of fair trial guarantees in articles 10 and 11 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the fact that the subject had been part of the debate about human rights since January 1946, when Cuba submitted a proposed draft declaration to the United Nations Economic and Social Council.⁶ There was a reference by a Belgian delegate, M. Fayat, during the first Plenary Sitting of the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe, on 19 August 1949, to 'the necessity of having a magistrature independent of parliamentary majorities and of the executive power'. Fayat said that the convention 'must take into account not only the substance of these freedoms, but also the political and legal safeguards by which these freedoms must be protected'.⁷ One of the Irish delegates, Sean MacEntee, said that the first twelve articles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights should be accepted 'without reservation', thereby implying the fair trial guarantees of articles 10 and 11.⁸

The final proposal of the Consultative Assembly did not incorporate a fair trial provision. The issue of fair trial appears to have been dealt with entirely as an adjectival matter and in the context of the jurisdiction of the European Court. If rights were denied as a result of an unfair trial, the European Court would then be entitled to review the decision of the national courts. The Draft Recommendation of the Consultative Assembly to the Committee of Ministers contained the following: 'Freedom from arbitrary arrest, detention and other measures in accordance with Articles 9, 10 and 11 of the United Nations Declaration'.⁹

The Committee of Ministers agreed that the draft of the Consultative Assembly should be studied by a Committee of Experts. The Committee of Experts met in February and March of 1950. It had been told by the Committee of Ministers that it was to pay 'due attention' to the draft Covenant adopted by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in June 1949.¹⁰ Unlike the Consultative Assembly text, the United Nations draft included a detailed provision dealing with fair trial guarantees:

1. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, or of his rights and obligations in a suit of law, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing, by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interest of morals, public order or national security or where the interest of juveniles or incapacitated persons so require.
2. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to the following minimum guarantees in full equality:
 - (a) to be informed promptly of the nature and cause of the accusation against him;
 - (b) to defend himself in person or through legal assistance which shall include the right to legal assistance of his own choosing, or, if he does not have such, to be informed of his right and, if unobtainable by him, to have legal assistance assigned;
 - (c) to examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him and to obtain compulsory attendance of witnesses in his behalf;
 - (d) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court.
3. Everyone who has undergone punishment as a result of an erroneous conviction of crime shall have an enforceable right to compensation. This right shall accrue to the heirs of a person executed by virtue of an erroneous sentence.¹¹

This is the direct ancestor of article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

The Committee of Experts developed two rather different drafts of the Convention. The first, subsequently labelled 'Alternatives A and A/2', was derived from the Consultative Assembly text. However, rather than simply make a reference to articles 10 and 11(1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Committee of Experts draft repeated them in full.¹² The second draft ('Alternatives B and B/2') was based upon a United Kingdom proposal containing a fair trial text modelled on the provision in the draft United Nations Covenant. There were two significant differences with the United Nations draft. The final paragraph concerning compensation for miscarriage of justice was deleted and the sub-paragraph dealing with legal aid was modified, to read as follows: 'to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing and, if he has not sufficient means to pay for such assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require'.¹³ The United Kingdom proposal was then refined by the drafting committee:

In the determination of any criminal charge against him or of his rights and obligations in a suit of law, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing, by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press or public may be excluded from all or part of the trial to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court, in the interest of morals, public order or national security, or where, in the special circumstances of the case, publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.

 - (e) to have free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court.¹⁴

The plenary Committee added the words 'and within a reasonable time' to paragraph 1 of the British text following the phrase 'established by law'.¹⁵ The British draft was accompanied by the following comments:

The word 'special' in the last sentence of [paragraph 1] is intended to underline the fact that such circumstances are an exception to the normal rule stated in the first sentence of the paragraph. It is not intended to bear the additional meaning that such circumstances should be of any particular degree of infrequency.

It was further agreed that the phrase 'the interests of justice' included cases in which the interests of one or the two parties or a third party would be manifestly prejudiced by publicity.¹⁶

The two competing versions were transmitted to the Committee of Ministers. It decided that they should be further examined by a Conference of Senior Officials.

The Conference of Senior Officials, meeting in June 1950, adopted the British draft with a few minor additions and changes. The words 'in a democratic society' were added at the end of the first sentence of paragraph 1. In paragraph 2, 'penal offence' was changed to 'criminal offence'. The words 'to the following minimum guarantees' were added at the end of the introductory phrase in paragraph 3. Paragraph 3(d) was changed to read: 'to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his own behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him'.¹⁷ The report of the Conference contained some comments on the provision. The Italian delegate 'considered that the drafting of this paragraph did not bring out the fact that courts dealing with penal cases should be constituted prior to the commission of the offence'. The report said that '[o]ther delegates considered that it might be possible to admit exceptions to this rule'. The French and Italian delegates thought that the paragraph concerning legal aid discriminated between those who could pay for defence counsel and those who could not because the former had 'the right, in any case, to have legal assistance of their own choosing, while the others are only entitled to the service of a defence counsel when the interests of justice so require'. They said the rule was contrary to the principle of non-discrimination enshrined in the draft. Finally, the report said that the purpose of revised paragraph 3(d) was 'to put the accused on a footing of equality with the public prosecutor, as regards the hearing of witnesses. It is obviously not a question of giving the accused the right to summon witnesses without any restriction'.¹⁸

In the Committee of Ministers, the United Kingdom proposed some amendments. With respect to the public nature of hearings, it said:

The present text of this Article leaves to the discretion of the court the exclusion of the press or public in a number of cases where, under English law, exclusion is enjoined by statute. Nor does it make provision for the cases in which the public may, under English law, be excluded from the hearing and determination by a court of summary jurisdiction of domestic proceedings, as well as cases concerning juveniles.

H.M. Government therefore propose that the second sentence of this paragraph be amended to read: 'The press and public may be excluded from all or part of a trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, or where the interests of juveniles or the parties to proceedings concerning their domestic relationships so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice; but the judgment shall be pronounced publicly except where the interests of juveniles or of the parties to proceedings concerning their domestic relationships otherwise require'.¹⁹

The final sentence of paragraph 1 was amended following deliberations at the sitting of 4 August 1950: 'Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of a trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, or where the interests of juveniles or the parties to proceedings concerning their domestic relationships so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice'.²⁰ It was changed slightly in the final version, the words 'in a democratic society, or where' being replaced by 'in a democratic society where'.²¹ Paragraph 6(3)(a) was also amended at the 4 August 1950 session with the replacement of the word 'cause' by 'details'.²² This too was changed in the final version so that the text read: 'to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail of the nature and cause of the accusation against him'.²³ Paragraph 6(3)(d) was amended as follows: 'to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him'. In paragraph 6(3)(d), the word 'the' was added before 'free assistance'.²⁴

The Consultative Assembly accepted the draft without comment. However, in the context of discussing the role of the Court, Pierre-Henri Teitgen complained that the Committee of Ministers had altered the intent of the Assembly with respect to review of national judicial decisions. He said that the Consultative Assembly had not intended to guarantee Europeans protection against the judicial errors of their own courts: 'We simply desired to secure for them freedom of defence, and procedural safeguards, because those safeguards are the very expression of individual liberty and of individual rights'.²⁵

The Committee of Legal Experts, meeting on 3 November 1950, made several amendments to the text.²⁶ The draft of paragraph 1 had begun with the words 'In the determination of any criminal charge against him or of his rights and obligations in a suit of law...'. The order was reversed, putting rights and obligations ahead of criminal charges, adding the word 'civil' before 'rights and obligations' and removing the words 'suit at law': 'In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him...'. The final sentence was amended, replacing the words 'or the parties to proceedings' with 'or the protection of the private life of the parties'. Paragraph 3, which began with the words 'In the determination of any criminal charge against him...' was changed to 'Everyone charged with a criminal offence...'. In paragraph (c), the conjunction 'and' following 'choosing' was replaced with 'or'. Two small changes were also made to the French text of the Convention. The penultimate draft of the final sentence of paragraph 1 read: 'Le jugement doit être rendu publiquement, mais l'accès de la salle d'audience peut être interdit à la presse et au public, pendant la totalité ou une partie du procès dans l'intérêt de la moralité, de l'ordre public ou de la sécurité nationale dans une société démocratique, lorsque les intérêts des mineurs ou de la vie privée des parties au procès l'exigent, ou dans la mesure jugée strictement nécessaire par la Cour, lorsque dans des circonstances spéciales la publicité serait de nature à porter atteinte aux intérêts de la justice.' The words 'la protection' were added immediately before 'de la vie privée' and the words 'la Cour' replaced with 'le tribunal'.

The title of article 6, 'Right to a fair trial', was added by Protocol No. 11.²⁷

Analysis and interpretation

Article 6 consists of three paragraphs, the first of which sets out a series of general principles applicable to the two basic categories of trials in modern justice systems, those that are civil and administrative ('rights and obligations') and those that are criminal in nature. Paragraph 1 enshrines the right to a 'fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law'. The second and third paragraphs of article 6 only apply to criminal trials. Paragraph 2 recognizes the presumption of innocence. Paragraph 3 provides a list of minimum guarantees that apply to the criminal trial.

Article 6 is confined to the fairness of the proceedings. The European Court does not sit in review of the decisions of national tribunals, correcting errors of law or fact that may be present in their rulings. This is sometimes described as the 'fourth instance doctrine'.²⁸ The Court has insisted that it is the role of the domestic courts 'to interpret and apply the relevant rules of procedural or substantive law. The domestic courts are best placed to assess the credibility of witnesses and the relevance of evidence to the issues in the case. It is also for the domestic courts to exclude evidence which is considered to be irrelevant'.²⁹ The Court will only question the assessments by domestic authorities if there is evidence of arbitrariness.³⁰

Fair trial rights set out in article 6 may be waived either expressly or tacitly. But to be effective for Convention purposes, any such waiver must 'be established in an unequivocal manner and be attended by minimum safeguards' commensurate with the importance of article 6.³¹ Usually, an individual will waive the benefit of certain rights in exchange for some perceived tactical advantage. According to the Grand Chamber, the person charged with a criminal offence should be able 'to expect the state to act in good faith and take due account of the procedural choices made by the defence, using the possibilities made available by law'. Any unilateral reduction in the advantages in exchange for which the individual has waived rights 'is contrary to the principle of legal certainty and the protection of the legitimate trust of persons engaged in judicial proceedings' and cannot be regarded as fair.³² An example of a waiver that has become increasingly common in some European States is so-called 'plea bargaining', by which an accused person agrees to an abbreviated procedure and to an admission of guilt in exchange for a reduction in the charges or some commitment to a mitigated sentence. The Court has said that plea bargaining is not in principle incompatible with article 6.³³

The right to a fair trial applies to the determination of 'civil rights and obligations' and 'any criminal charge'. The general principles set out in paragraph 1 are applicable to both categories. Criminal proceedings require more specific guarantees, such as the presumption of innocence (art. 6(2)) and the very precise matters addressed in paragraph 3. But the presence of special rules listed in paragraph 3 does not suggest in any way that the principles they reflect are not applicable to paragraph 1 as well. Frequently, when criminal trials are concerned, the Convention organs examine paragraphs 1 and 3 of article 6 together.

The fair trial provision in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union is broader than article 6. Article 47 of the Charter does not confine the right to a fair trial to disputes relating to 'civil rights and obligations' or to 'any criminal charge', and does not refer to a 'determination', as the Grand Chamber observed in Micallef v. Malta.³⁴ The Grand Chamber was considering the somewhat restrictive approach taken by the European Court to the scope of article 6, in particular the general exclusion of interim or preliminary proceedings. It noted that even before the adoption of the European Charter, the European Court of Justice had considered that fair trial standards applied to provisional measures granted ex parte, that is, in the absence of the defendant.³⁵

Determination of civil rights and obligations

The so-called 'civil limb' of article 6 governs the 'determination of civil rights and obligations'. This requires that there be a dispute (in French, contestation) over a 'civil right' that is arguably recognized by domestic law, regardless of whether it is also protected by the European Convention.³⁶ There is a difference in the English and French versions of the Convention. The English text speaks of 'determination of his rights and obligations', whereas the French uses the expression 'des contestations sur ses droits et obligations'. It has been held that '[c]onformity with the spirit of the Convention' requires that the text 'should not be construed too technically and that it should be given a substantive rather than a formal meaning'.³⁷ Article 6 will not be applicable in a judicial procedure that is by its very nature unilateral, without opposing parties, such as certain modifications in civil status.³⁸

Furthermore, the dispute must be 'genuine and serious'.³⁹ There is a presumption that a claim that has been submitted to a tribunal meets this criterion. There must be 'clear indications' to justify a conclusion that a claim is frivolous, vexatious, or lacking in foundation.⁴⁰ It may relate either to the actual existence of a right or to its scope and the manner of its exercise.⁴¹ The result of the proceedings 'must be directly decisive for the right in question, mere tenuous connections or remote consequences not being sufficient to bring Article 6 § 1 into play'.⁴² Accordingly, if the Court considers that the proceedings undertaken by an applicant do not provide a remedy capable of addressing his or her contentions on the merits, it will conclude that the domestic proceedings cannot result in a determination of the alleged civil rights and obligations. Consequently, the application under the Convention will be deemed incompatible ratione materiae with article 6.⁴³

No particular substantive content is contemplated by the concept of civil rights and obligations. The Court cannot create through article 6(1) a substantive right that has no foundation in national law.⁴⁴ The distinction between substantive and procedural matters, 'fine as it may be in a particular case', nevertheless 'remains determinative of the applicability and, as appropriate, the scope of the guarantees of Article 6 of the Convention'.⁴⁵ The guarantees enshrined in article 6 extend only to rights that can be said, 'at least on arguable grounds', to be recognized by domestic law.⁴⁶ Thus, the starting point for the application of 'rights and obligations' is the domestic law as interpreted by the courts.⁴⁷ Other criteria that the Court may consider will include 'recognition of the alleged right in similar circumstances by the domestic courts or the fact that the latter examined the merits of the applicant's request'.⁴⁸ But '[t]he character of the legislation which governs how the matter is to be determined (civil, commercial, administrative law, and so on) and that of the authority which is invested with jurisdiction in the matter (ordinary court, administrative body, and so forth) are therefore of little consequence'.⁴⁹ Nevertheless, the concept of 'civil rights and obligations' is autonomous in the sense that it has its own meaning under the Convention, regardless of how the term may be understood in domestic legislation.⁵⁰ Otherwise, States would be able to circumvent article 6 by labelling rights as being matters of public or administrative law rather than civil law. It is necessary to 'look beyond the appearances and the language used and concentrate on the realities of the situation'.⁵¹

Obviously, article 6 will apply to private law disputes concerning tort or civil responsibility and contractual matters. Family law issues such as an action contesting paternity⁵² and judicial separation⁵³ also fall under article 6. Article 6 applies to conditions for admission to an occupation or a profession⁵⁴ as well as to disciplinary matters within the profession where the right to practice is at stake.⁵⁵ Closer to the boundary between civil law and administrative or public law, the Court has held that article 6(1) applies to lawsuits for negligence against the police,⁵⁶ the local authorities,⁵⁷ and the State.⁵⁸ Article 6(1) may also be invoked in constitutional proceedings to the extent that they have a decisive bearing on a dispute concerning a civil right.⁵⁹

Where issues that are governed by public law are decisive in determining private rights and obligations, they fall within article 6(1). Examples included planning permission,⁶⁰ permission to sell land,⁶¹ authorization to operate a private clinic,⁶² compensation for work-related illness,⁶³ and a licence to serve alcoholic beverages.⁶⁴ Article 6(1) also applies to issues concerning social rights such as proceedings relating to social security benefits and contributions.⁶⁵

With respect to government employees, the Convention organs initially considered them to be outside the ambit of article 6(1) altogether. Eventually, this exclusion was softened by the application of a 'functional criterion' whereby police officials and similar functionaries were excluded from article 6 because of their role within the exercise of State power.⁶⁶ However, the Court found this to be an imperfect approach and shifted its view in favour of deciding that this could lead to anomalies. It refined its approach, creating a presumption favouring application of article 6. The Grand Chamber said that 'it is primarily for the Contracting States, in particular the competent national legislature, not the Court, to identify expressly those areas of public service involving the exercise of the discretionary powers intrinsic to State sovereignty where the interests of the individual must give way'.⁶⁷ If an applicant has access to a court under national law, then article 6(1) will apply. The Court has recognized the applicability of the Convention to employment-related disputes of embassy staff,⁶⁸ parliamentary officials,⁶⁹ and even judges.⁷⁰

However, tax assessments fall outside the scope of article 6(1),⁷¹ as do disputes about the results of elections.⁷² Extradition proceedings are excluded from the notion of rights and obligations.⁷³ Similarly, decisions about the entry, the right to remain, and deportation of aliens do not fall under article 6(1).⁷⁴

Prisoners are not excluded from the scope of article 6 for the reason that 'justice cannot stop at the prison gate'.⁷⁵ The case law of the Convention organs confirms that 'prisoners in general continue to enjoy all the fundamental rights and freedoms guaranteed under the Convention save for the right to liberty, where lawfully imposed detention expressly falls within the scope of Article 5 of the Convention'.⁷⁶ However, issues concerning the detention regime itself do not generally fall under the 'rights and obligations' branch of article 6.⁷⁷

Preliminary proceedings, such as the grant of an interim measure like an injunction, were traditionally excluded from the scope of article 6 because they were not considered to determine civil rights and obligations.⁷⁸ Typically, such measures are granted following summary proceedings, sometimes even in the absence of one of the parties, and are designed to preserve rights until the merits of a dispute can be resolved rather than address the merits themselves, or even prejudice their eventual determination. The Court's reticence to extend the protections of article 6 to such proceedings can be seen in applications concerning delays, where the Convention organs generally make the determination of the relevant time period from the start of the case on the merits and not from the request for preliminary measures.⁷⁹ The Court made exceptions in cases where the preliminary or interim proceedings appeared to be decisive to the civil rights at issue.⁸⁰ In 2009, in Micallef v. Malta, the Grand Chamber recognized that such a view was inconsistent with the practice of European States and that there was widespread consensus at the national level on the application of article 6 to interim proceedings.⁸¹ The Grand Chamber pointed to problems of backlogs in 'overburdened justice systems leading to excessively long proceedings', where a ruling on an interim injunction may in reality amount to a ruling on the merits, with long-lasting or permanent effect.⁸² Consequently,

'the Court no longer finds it justified to automatically characterise injunction proceedings as not determinative of civil rights or obligations'.⁸³

Explaining its new approach to article 6 within the context of interim proceedings, the Grand Chamber said there were two elements. First, 'the right at stake in both the main and the injunction proceedings should be "civil" within the autonomous meaning of that notion under Article 6 of the Convention'.⁸⁴ Second, 'the nature of the interim measure, its object and purpose as well as its effects on the right in question should be scrutinised. Whenever an interim measure can be considered effectively to determine the civil right or obligation at stake, notwithstanding the length of time it is in force, Article 6 will be applicable'.⁸⁵ The Grand Chamber conceded that there would be exceptional cases where the effectiveness of a measure sought would depend upon speedy determination and that compliance with article 6 might not be entirely possible. In such cases, the State would be required to demonstrate that specific procedural safeguards could not be respected without unduly prejudicing the attainment of the objectives sought by the interim measure in question.⁸⁶

Article 6(1) continues to apply through to the enforcement stage. For example, in legal systems where liability is determined initially in criminal proceedings but where the amount of damages is set subsequently, article 6(1) remains relevant.⁸⁷ Execution of a judgment is deemed to be part of the trial itself and therefore is governed by article 6(1).⁸⁸ However, proceedings to reopen a case have been excluded from the ambit of article 6(1) by the Convention organs to the extent that they are not concerned with determining the rights or obligations of an individual but rather assessing whether there is admissible new evidence or some similar ground. But once a decision is taken to permit the proceedings to be reopened, the ensuing determination on the merits certainly falls within the scope of article 6(1).⁸⁹

Determination of a criminal charge

Article 6(1) also applies to the 'determination of . . . a criminal charge' (in French, du bien-fondé de toute accusation en matière pénale dirigée contre elle). Paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 6 also apply to persons charged with a criminal offence. The criminal limb of paragraph 1 of article 6 is engaged by 'any criminal charge'. Paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 6 apply to a person 'charged with a criminal offence'. Sometimes it is easy to determine that a person is subject to a criminal charge, in that formal criminal charges will have been laid against the individual in question. The criminal charge has been defined as 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he has committed a criminal offence'. This definition also corresponds to the test whether the suspect's situation has been 'substantially affected'.⁹⁰

The Engel criteria

Three criteria, originally set out in Engel and Others v. the Netherlands,⁹¹ have been used to assess whether the criminal limb of article 6 applies: the classification of the offence in domestic law, the nature of the offence, and the severity of the penalty that is at risk. Because the concept of 'criminal charge' has an autonomous meaning under the Convention regardless of how it is defined or characterized in national law,⁹² the first of these criteria is the least important. It is 'no more than a starting point'.⁹³ The same cannot be said of the second and third criteria.⁹⁴ The second and third criteria are alternative and not cumulative,⁹⁵ although they may collectively lead to the conclusion that the applicant has been charged with a criminal offence when one of them alone does not provide a convincing answer.⁹⁶ Application of the Engel criteria has led to 'a gradual broadening of the criminal head to cases not strictly belonging to the traditional categories of the criminal law, for example administrative penalties'.⁹⁷ While acknowledging that 'a certain gravity attaches' to criminal proceedings, which involve the imposition of punitive and deterrent sanctions, 'it is self-evident that there are criminal cases which do not carry any significant degree of stigma'.⁹⁸

Several factors are considered in evaluating whether to describe the nature of the offence—the second of the Engel criteria—as criminal: the legal rule should be of a generally binding character and not directed against a specific group;⁹⁹ the proceedings should be instituted by a public body with statutory powers of enforcement;¹⁰⁰ the prohibition should be commensurate with a deterrent and punitive purpose;¹⁰¹ imposition of a penalty should be dependent upon a finding of guilt;¹⁰² and the classification of similar matters in the law of other Council of Europe Member States.¹⁰³ The consequence of a criminal record upon conviction is of significance but it is not decisive because this is dependent upon the classification of the offence in domestic law.¹⁰⁴ The relative lack of seriousness of a sanction 'cannot deprive an offence of its inherently criminal character'.¹⁰⁵

The third Engel criterion is the maximum penalty to which the individual is exposed.¹⁰⁶ The actual penalty imposed is also of relevance,¹⁰⁷ but it does not diminish the importance of what was initially at stake.¹⁰⁸ Detention ('strict arrest') of two days as part of military discipline was held to be of too short a duration to indicate a criminal offence.¹⁰⁹ On the other hand, committal to a disciplinary unit for a period of several months meets the criminal law standard.¹¹⁰ A five-day sentence of detention is sufficiently criminal for article 6(1) to apply.¹¹¹ A fine of 500 Swiss francs, with the possibility that it be converted into a term of imprisonment if not paid, was considered to cross the threshold into criminal law.¹¹² When the second Engel criterion is clearly present, the relatively low amount of an administrative fine does not suffice to exclude the matter from the scope of article 6(1).¹¹³ As with the nature of the 'crime' itself, the label given to the sanction by national law may disguise the reality of the punishment. Where deprivation of liberty may be imposed, there is a presumption that the related charges are criminal within the meaning of article 6. It can only be rebutted, 'entirely exceptionally', if the deprivation of liberty is not deemed to be 'appreciably detrimental' in light of the nature, duration, or manner of execution.¹¹⁴

Domestic legal systems generally distinguish between criminal or penal offences and disciplinary offences.¹¹⁵ Treating a matter as a disciplinary issue has advantages for the individual, who generally receives a milder sanction and, moreover, does not have a criminal record imposed. While States have the right to distinguish between criminal and disciplinary law, and there is a presumption that an offence classified as disciplinary under national law is not to be deemed criminal in nature, the Court 'has reserved the power to satisfy itself that the line drawn between these does not prejudice the object and purpose of Article 6'.¹¹⁶ The first of the Engel criteria makes it clear that the classification given to an offence by a State is without prejudice to the Court's autonomous assessment. Genuine disciplinary sanctions fall outside the second of the Engel criteria because they are not intended to apply generally. Rather, they are 'designed to ensure that the members of particular groups comply with the specific rules governing their conduct'.¹¹⁷ The fact that a disciplinary violation may also be a criminal offence, however, does not suffice to make the disciplinary proceedings criminal in nature.¹¹⁸ Nor is there any problem in principle with conduct being the subject of both criminal and disciplinary proceedings.¹¹⁹ The Court must only 'satisfy itself that the disciplinary does not improperly encroach upon the criminal'.¹²⁰

Substantive criminal law

Although in its application to criminal law article 6 is not exclusively confined to procedural issues, States have a very broad discretion in the identification and definition of crimes. The scope of criminal law will certainly not be the same in each national system, with choices being made by national legislators about what should and should not fall within the scope of criminal justice. According to the Court, '[t]he Convention leaves the States free to designate as a criminal offence an act or omission not constituting the normal exercise of one of the rights that it protects'.¹²¹ It does not 'dictate the content of domestic criminal law, including whether or not a blameworthy state of mind should be one of the elements of the offence or whether there should be any particular defence available to the accused'.¹²² States may, 'in principle and under certain conditions, penalise a simple or objective fact as such, irrespective of whether it results from criminal intent or from negligence'.¹²³

States may indeed be required to criminalize certain acts either as a result of the Convention¹²⁴ or by virtue of other international obligations,¹²⁵ but this is not a matter that arises under article 6. Decisions of the Court have recognized an obligation flowing from provisions of the Convention to define certain acts as criminal: rape;¹²⁶ forced labour;¹²⁷ willful attack on personal integrity;¹²⁸ human trafficking;¹²⁹ disclosure of certain types of information;¹³⁰ and certain offences against children.¹³¹ At the same time, the Court has condemned the criminalization of certain acts as discriminatory or excessive: homosexual activity;¹³² and acts related to the exercise of freedom of expression¹³³ and peaceful assembly.¹³⁴ All forms of collective guilt, whereby individuals are punished not for their acts or omissions but for their association with others, raise difficulties with the presumption of innocence. Noting that 'it is a fundamental rule of criminal law that criminal liability does not survive the person who has committed the criminal act', the Court has held that '[i]nheritance of the guilt of the dead is not compatible with the standards of criminal justice in a society governed by the rule of law'.¹³⁵

Criminal procedure varies considerably throughout Europe. The Court has insisted that 'the High Contracting Parties [are free] to determine their own criminal policy, which is not in principle a matter for it to comment on' and that 'a State's choice of a particular criminal justice system is in principle outside the scope of the supervision it carries out at European level, provided that the system chosen does not contravene the principles set forth in the Convention'.¹³⁶ It is not the Court's job to standardize the criminal justice systems that prevail throughout the continent.¹³⁷ Nevertheless, there can be no doubt that the decisions and reports of the Commission and the judgments of the Court dealing with article 6 have influenced the evolution of criminal procedure and substantive criminal law across the continent. The common denominator is larger today than it was six decades ago. The Convention and its organs are at least partially responsible for this.

Procedural stages

One consequence of a broad and purposive approach to the notion of 'charged' is that article 6 is applicable to the preliminary investigation stage of criminal prosecution. Although the primary objective of the provision is ensuring that the trial proceedings are fair, it 'may be relevant before a case is sent for trial if and so far as the fairness of the trial is likely to be seriously prejudiced by an initial failure to comply with its provisions'.¹³⁸ Difficulties may arise during the period prior to the issuance of formal charges when in practice the individual is already suspected of the crime. For example, a person stopped at a road check who is questioned without being told of suspicions against him or her or that any statement could be used was 'substantially affected', although not formally accused of a criminal offence.¹³⁹ The Court has held that although a person has 'not yet been charged with an offence, the preliminary acts of investigation carried out by the authorities together with their attempt to impose an order on the applicant not to leave the city formed part of the judicial investigation initiated against him and made him a person "charged with a criminal offence".¹⁴⁰ A 'substantive' rather than a 'formalist' understanding of the notions of 'charge' and 'charged' must prevail in order to respect the importance of fairness in the criminal trial process. This 'impels the Court to look behind appearances and examine the realities of the procedure in question in order to determine whether there has been a "charge" within the meaning of Article 6'.¹⁴¹

In principle, if criminal trial proceedings result in an acquittal or if the prosecution is discontinued, the individual who was once charged with an offence cannot claim to have been a victim of a violation of article 6.¹⁴² There is an exception to this principle in subsequent proceedings to the extent that the presumption of innocence has been infringed upon. Nevertheless, there is much authority for the exclusion of proceedings relating to execution of a sentence from the scope of article 6(1),¹⁴³ including service of a committal warrant.¹⁴⁴

Because article 6(1) applies throughout the proceedings, it includes the sentencing phase even where this is a distinct procedural step.¹⁴⁵ This may extend to various consequences of a criminal law determination, such as demolition of a house constructed without planning permission.¹⁴⁶ However, measures concerning execution or enforcement of a sentence including application for amnesty have generally been excluded from the scope of article 6(1).¹⁴⁷ The criminal limb of article 6(1) does not apply to parole proceedings¹⁴⁸ and to those involving transfer of prisoners from one country to another.¹⁴⁹

Within the realm of criminal procedure, there are many incidental or related proceedings that do not qualify as 'determination... of a criminal charge'. Certain police measures undertaken for the prevention of crime or disorder are, by their nature, related to criminal justice, but they do not involve criminal charges and have generally been excluded from the scope of article 6(1). For example, Italian legislation provided for the adoption of preventive measures in respect of 'persons presenting a danger for security and public morality'. The applicant, who was suspected of participating in organized crime, challenged the special police supervision to which he was subject. Declaring inadmissible the application based upon article 6(1), the Court held that 'special supervision is not comparable to a criminal sanction because it is designed to prevent the commission of offence'.¹⁵⁰ In the absence of criminal proceedings as such, forfeiture measures are not considered to fall within the 'determination of a criminal charge'.¹⁵¹ Although not unrelated to the determination of a criminal trial, legal aid applications with respect to obtaining defence counsel do not normally touch upon the legal or factual merits of the charge and are therefore excluded from the scope of the criminal limb of article 6(1).¹⁵²

Expulsion, deportation, and extradition matters are not generally contemplated by the criminal limb of article 6(1), even if they may often involve matters that are ancillary to criminal prosecution.¹⁵³ Nevertheless, article 6(1) may apply extraterritorially to the extent that expulsion, refoulement, or deportation may result in a real risk that the individual would be subject to a 'flagrant denial of justice' in the receiving country.¹⁵⁴ The notion is synonymous with a trial that is 'manifestly contrary to the provisions of Article 6 or the principles embodied therein'.¹⁵⁵

Disciplinary offences

Military discipline was the subject of the leading case in this area, Engel and Others v. The Netherlands. Because of the relatively minor nature of the sanctions imposed, the European Court concluded that two of the applicants fell outside the criminal sphere. Three of them, however, were exposed to 'serious punishments involving deprivation of liberty', leading the Court to conclude that article 6(1) applied.¹⁵⁶ The criminal limb of article 6(1) does not apply to discharge from the armed forces.¹⁵⁷

Prison discipline matters often cross the threshold from simple disciplinary matters into the realm of criminal law. In an early judgment, the Court said it was 'well aware that in the prison context there are practical reasons and reasons of policy for establishing a special disciplinary regime, for example security considerations and the interests of public order, the need to deal with misconduct by inmates as expeditiously as possible, the availability of tailor-made sanctions which may not be at the disposal of the ordinary courts and the desire of the prison authorities to retain ultimate responsibility for discipline within their establishments'.¹⁵⁸ The classic distinction in terms of sanctions by which deprivation of liberty is in principle sufficient to engage the criminal law classification does not necessarily apply to the prison environment, because liberty has already been deprived. A Chamber of the Court has held that a disciplinary sanction of one week in solitary confinement 'did not in any way extend the applicant's prison term' and was therefore 'not of such nature and severity that the matter would thereby have been brought within the "criminal" sphere'.¹⁵⁹ When the United Kingdom argued that loss of entitlement to remission of sentence as a sanction for disciplinary offences was not really a 'punishment' in a criminal sense, the Grand Chamber said that the 'reality' of the system was that 'prisoners were detained in prison beyond the date on which they would otherwise have been released, as a consequence of separate disciplinary proceedings which were legally unconnected to the original conviction and sentence'.¹⁶⁰ Matters relating to administration of the prison system, such as placement in a high-supervision unit, do not fall under the criminal limb of article 6(1), although they may be addressed under the civil limb.¹⁶¹

The case law of the Convention organs has placed the discipline of professional bodies under the civil limb of article 6(1).¹⁶² With respect to legal professionals, the Court has considered that issues concerning the misconduct during judicial proceedings are excluded from the criminal limb of article 6(1), 'noting that courts may need to respond to such conduct even if it is neither necessary nor practicable to bring a criminal charge against the person concerned'.¹⁶³ However, because of the nature and severity of the penalty, contempt of court proceedings may constitute an exception to this general rule.¹⁶⁴ To the extent that they may apply not only to legal professionals but also to the public at large, they fall under the criminal law limb of article 6(1) by virtue of the second Engel criterion.¹⁶⁵ A similar approach has been taken to sanctions imposed for contempt of Parliament, where significance was attached to the fact that the applicant was a private individual and not only an elected member of the legislature.¹⁶⁶ A sanctions regime imposed upon public employees involved in corrupt practices leading, in extreme cases, to 'compulsory retirement', was considered to fall outside the criminal limb of article 6.¹⁶⁷ The criminal limb of article 6 is not applicable in proceedings regarding dismissal of a bailiff for a range of misdemeanours.¹⁶⁸

Regulatory offences

Another important distinction that is usually made in domestic legal systems is between administrative or regulatory offences and truly criminal offences. With respect to road traffic offences, the European Court of Human Rights has considered article 6(1) to be applicable to the extent infractions are punishable by fines or driving restrictions, including penalty points.¹⁶⁹ However, precautionary measures such as immediate withdrawal of a driving licence and suspension from driving for a short period of time do not qualify as criminal offences.¹⁷⁰ The Court has applied article 6(1) to violations of social security legislation, even when relatively modest fines are involved.¹⁷¹ In a case involving administrative imposition of tax penalties that were very substantial where the taxpayer was not in good faith, the Court noted in features of the scheme 'the predominance of those which have a criminal connotation. None of them is decisive on its own, but taken together and cumulatively they made the "charge" in issue a "criminal" one within the meaning of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1), which was therefore applicable.'¹⁷²

Regulation of the democratic process often involves sanctions or penalties in various forms, raising difficulties in the application of article 6(1). Sanctions imposed as part of the regulation of democratic elections have been excluded from the criminal limb of article 6(1). For example, disqualification from standing for office where a candidate exceeded limits on election spending was not considered to be criminal in nature.¹⁷³ Proceedings before the Constitutional Court to challenge the dissolution of a political party involved 'par excellence, . . . droit de nature politique', so that article 6(1) could not be invoked.¹⁷⁴ Similarly, criminal law did not apply to impeachment proceedings directed at a country's president.¹⁷⁵ The Court has noted a close connection between lustration proceedings, by which individuals are excluded from various forms of political and other activities as part of the process of 'dismantling the heritage of former communist totalitarian systems', and the criminal law sphere.¹⁷⁶ But in a Lithuanian case, it noted that '[t]he purpose of the penalties was thus to prevent former employees of a foreign secret service from employment in public institutions and other spheres of activity vital to the national security of the State', placing the complaint outside of the criminal limb of article 6(1).¹⁷⁷ The activities of commissions of inquiry set up to investigate corruption within elected bodies do not normally involve criminal sanctions. In an Italian case, the Court noted that the commission in question 'se bornait à examiner le phénomène mafieux dans le but de l'étudier et de vérifier tant l'exécution des lois existantes, tant la nécessité de procéder à des modifications législatives. Dans ce type de questions d'intérêt général et véritablement public, rien n'indique que les travaux de la commission parlementaire aient constitué une quelconque forme déguisée de procédure pénale.'¹⁷⁸

Access to a court

Article 6 does not provide an explicit guarantee of a right of access to a court. This right results from a creative interpretation of the provision by the Court in the leading case of Golder v. the United Kingdom. In that decision, the Court noted that article 6(1) 'does not state a right of access to the courts or tribunals in express terms'; rather, it enunciates distinct rights that 'stem from the same basic idea and which, taken together, make up a single right not specifically defined in the narrower sense of the term'.¹⁷⁹ The Court said it was 'inconceivable' that article 6(1) could offer a detailed description of procedural guarantees, yet that it 'should not first protect that which alone makes it in fact possible to benefit from such guarantees, that is, access to a court. The fair, public and expeditious characteristics of judicial proceedings are of no value at all if there are no judicial proceedings.¹⁸⁰ It described the right as 'inherent', explaining that this was not 'an extensive interpretation forcing new obligations on the Contracting States: it is based on the very terms of the first sentence of Article 6 § 1 read in its context and having regard to the object and purpose of the Convention, a law-making treaty'.¹⁸¹

The right of access must be effective. Consequently, it may be necessary for the State to ensure that litigants are provided with legal assistance. The right to legal aid in civil proceedings was recognized by the Court on this basis, although it accepted that there are also circumstances where it would be sufficient for an individual to appear before a tribunal without professional legal assistance.¹⁸² Legal aid must be provided by the State only 'when such assistance proves indispensable for an effective access to court either because legal representation is rendered compulsory or by reason of the complexity of the procedure or of the case'.¹⁸³ Availability of legal assistance is relevant to another feature of the right to a fair trial, namely the concept of 'equality of arms', something discussed in more detail below.¹⁸⁴

Legal certainty has been identified as one component of this right of access to a court. According to the Court, '[t]he right of access to a court is impaired when the rules cease to serve the aims of legal certainty and the proper administration of justice and form a sort of barrier preventing the litigant from having his or her case determined on the merits by the competent court'.¹⁸⁵ The principle of legal certainty is also part of the rule of law, referred to in the Preamble of the Convention, and the principle of legality, set out in article 7. Moreover, it forms part of the requirement that any restriction on fundamental rights be 'in accordance with the law' (art. 8(2)) or 'prescribed by law' (arts. 9(2), 10(2) and 11(2)).

This right of access is not absolute. The right of access to a court may be subject to limitations because the right itself 'by its very nature calls for regulation by the State'.¹⁸⁶ The Court 'must be satisfied that the limitations applied do not restrict or reduce the access left to the individual in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right is impaired. Furthermore, a limitation will not be compatible with Article 6 § 1 if it does not pursue a legitimate aim and if there is not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved'.¹⁸⁷ An example of a permissible limitation on the right of access is provided by court costs. However, these must bear in mind the specific circumstances of the case, including the resources of the litigant and the phase of the procedure.¹⁸⁸ Others include the decision not to prosecute and the discontinuance of proceedings,¹⁸⁹ restrictions on abusive litigants,¹⁹⁰ statutory limitation periods,¹⁹¹ time limits for appeals,¹⁹² and mandatory legal representation.¹⁹³

There is no requirement of a right to appeal in article 6(1). Protocol No. 7 added this with respect to criminal trials. However, if courts of appeal do exist and are applicable to any given litigation, they must comply with the requirements of article 6(1) in guaranteeing an effective right of access to the courts.¹⁹⁴ In assessing whether there has been a violation of article 6, the Court will take into account whether it was possible for the violation to be corrected on appeal.¹⁹⁵

The right of access to a tribunal may be restricted by immunities that protect one of the parties, generally the defendant or respondent. Ordinarily, these take two forms: the immunity of foreign states and intergovernmental bodies derived from international law and, in certain countries, the immunity of parliamentarians resulting from national legal provisions. As a general principle, the Court has said that 'it would not be consistent with the rule of law in a democratic society if a State could remove from the jurisdiction of the courts a whole range of civil claims or confer immunities from civil liability on large groups or categories of persons'.¹⁹⁶ From the point of view of its compatibility with the Convention, 'the broader an immunity, the more compelling must be its justification'.¹⁹⁷

Sovereign immunity protects a State from being sued in the courts of another country, where the rights of litigants to access to a tribunal find themselves limited accordingly. This has its source in public international law, including customary international law. On this matter, the judgments of the International Court of Justice are authoritative. In the context of article 6, recognition of sovereign immunity pursues a legitimate aim of 'complying with international law to promote comity and good relations between States through the respect of another State's sovereignty'.¹⁹⁸ The Court has held the 'measures taken by a State which reflect generally recognised rules of public international law on State immunity cannot in principle be regarded as imposing a disproportionate restriction on the right of access to a court as embodied in Article 6 § 1.¹⁹⁹ Similar considerations apply to intergovernmental organizations.²⁰⁰

Parliamentary immunity is a long-standing practice by which States shelter elected officials from lawsuits for the purpose of protecting freedom of expression within the legislature and maintaining the separation of powers so that the courts do not interfere inappropriately with the activities of democratic representatives.²⁰¹ The Court recognizes a wide margin of appreciation in this area of parliamentary law.²⁰² However, the scrutiny will be stricter where there is no clear connection between the parliamentary activity and the immunity accorded, as in the case of a personal quarrel.²⁰³

Fair and public hearing (art. 6(1))

Regardless of whether the trial concerns criminal or civil matters, it must be 'fair'. According to the text of article 6(1), this consists of two components: a hearing must take place 'within a reasonable time'; and it must be held before 'an independent and impartial tribunal established by law'. Case law has added a number of other principles: equality of arms; the right to be present at the hearing; protection against self-incrimination; and protection from pre-trial publicity. There is also a concept of cumulative violation, by which several irregularities result in overall unfairness, even if taken individually they are not enough to constitute a breach of a fair trial.²⁰⁴ The fairness of proceedings is considered in light of the proceedings as a whole.²⁰⁵

Special components of fairness in criminal proceedings are addressed in article 6(3). Article 6(1) provides a broad guarantee of fairness that is of general application. Of course, despite the lex specialis of article 6(3), '[t]he general requirements of fairness contained in Article 6 apply to all criminal proceedings, irrespective of the type of offence at issue.²⁰⁶ Nevertheless, because the features of article 6(3) are not included in article 6(1), States have greater latitude when their courts are dealing with civil rights and obligations than when criminal matters are concerned.²⁰⁷

The principle of ‘equality of arms’ is a component of the right to a fair hearing. It first appeared in very early decisions of the European Commission of Human Rights²⁰⁸ before being endorsed in the case law of the Court.²⁰⁹ It requires that ‘as regards litigation involving opposing private interests, “equality of arms” implies that each party must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case—including his evidence—under conditions that do not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent’.²¹⁰ For example, the Court held that the Belgian criminal justice system, whereby submissions at the appellate level were made by the avocat général who then participated in the deliberations of the court in the absence of the other party, who had no opportunity to reply, was in breach of this principle.²¹¹ In cases involving civil proceedings and detainees, the Court has accepted that transporting a party from a prison to a civil tribunal may be troublesome. It has concluded that allowing a party to be represented rather than appear in person does not breach the principle of equality of arms and that article 6(1) does not guarantee a right to be present at civil proceedings.²¹²

There is a close relationship between the notion of ‘equality of arms’ and the desirability of adversarial proceedings. The Court has frequently spoken of the ‘right to adversarial proceedings’.²¹³ For example, the principle of equality of arms is compromised when one of the parties is not given access to the entire court record,²¹⁴ or when the court does not serve evidence from one party upon the other.²¹⁵ Similarly, the inability of a defendant to challenge expert evidence submitted by the public prosecutor contravenes the principle of equality of arms.²¹⁶ Nevertheless, restrictions on adversarial procedure may be allowed when strictly necessary ‘in the light of a strong countervailing public interest, such as national security, the need to keep secret certain police methods of investigation or the protection of the fundamental rights of another person’.²¹⁷

Public hearing and public pronouncement of judgment

Article 6(1) imposes the requirement that in the determination of civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge, there must be ‘a hearing’. A full and proper hearing means that ‘an applicant has an entitlement to have his case “heard”, with the opportunity, inter alia, to give evidence in his own defence, hear the evidence against him, and examine and cross-examine the witnesses'.²¹⁸ The raison d'être for the public nature of the hearing, the Grand Chamber has explained, is its protection of litigants against the administration of justice without public scrutiny. This is 'one of the means whereby confidence in the courts, superior and inferior, can be maintained. By rendering the administration of justice visible, publicity contributes to the achievement of the aim of Article 6 § 1, namely a fair trial, the guarantee of which is one of the fundamental principles of any democratic society, within the meaning of the Convention.'²¹⁹ The public hearing has been described as a 'fundamental principle'.²²⁰

Despite the literal terms of article 6(1), the Court has said that this obligation is not an absolute one and that a 'hearing' may be dispensed with. There may be circumstances where the procedure is entirely written and where the parties do not have an opportunity to have any direct contact with the members of the tribunal concerned, without this being deemed a violation of article 6(1). In particular, a hearing may not be required where issues of credibility or contested facts do not arise, and where a fair assessment may reasonably be made based upon written submissions and other materials.²²¹ The principle of a hearing is said to be particularly important in the criminal trial context, 'where generally there must be at first instance a tribunal which fully meets the requirements of Article 6',²²² although even in criminal matters, 'the nature of the issues to be dealt with before the tribunal or court may not require an oral hearing'.²²³ National authorities may take into account factors such as efficiency and economy in determining that holding hearings on a systematic basis may pose an obstacle to the requirement of a determination within a reasonable time, as required by article 6(1).²²⁴ Early cases before the Convention organs emphasized the exceptional nature of dispensing with a hearing,²²⁵ but the Court has since explained that the relevant circumstances capable of justifying this are the nature of the issues to be decided and not the frequency of such situations. Thus, the denial of a hearing is not confined only to 'rare cases'.²²⁶

Article 6(1) requires that the hearing be 'public'. This means that it must be genuinely accessible. Infringements on the public nature of a hearing occur when it is held in a venue where there is restricted access, where persons other than those participating in the hearing are not allowed to be present, and where there is an absence of information available to the public about the date and place of the hearing.²²⁷ A litigant may waive the right to a public hearing²²⁸ as long as it is done in an unequivocal manner and does not run counter to an important public interest.²²⁹ However, absent wholly exceptional circumstances, as a minimum, litigants must have the opportunity to request a public hearing. Where the public hearing is not mandatory, however, the tribunal may deny such an application and proceed in private.²³⁰

The second sentence of article 6(1) states that 'the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice'. The application of these provisions should be 'strictly required by the circumstances'.²³¹ For example, while disciplinary hearings to disqualify practicing physicians may require confidentiality in order to protect the privacy of patients, a systematic practice of holding such proceedings in camera, even when patient-related information is not at issue, is inconsistent with article 6(1).²³² The presence of classified information in the case file resulting from national security concerns does not automatically warrant exclusion of the public. This must be assessed on a case-by-case basis rather than automatically, 'weighing the principle that court hearings should be held in public against the need to protect public order and national security'.²³³ Courts must consider alternative measures with the intent to minimize the exclusion of the public and the press, such as restricting access to certain documents or holding only some sessions in camera.²³⁴

Article 6(1) provides specifically for public pronouncement of the judgment. It is an additional right, however, one that is 'free-standing',²³⁵ and is not to be taken as a substitute for holding the hearing in public. Announcement of the judgment in public does not correct a proceeding from which the public was excluded.²³⁶ According to the Court, '[t]he publicity of judicial decisions aims to ensure scrutiny of the judiciary by the public and constitutes a basic safeguard against arbitrariness'.²³⁷

The requirement of public pronouncement of the judgment 'must be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question, having regard to their entirety, and by reference to the object and purpose of Article 6 § 1'.²³⁸ In reality, the Court has shown considerable flexibility in the application of this right. In several early cases, it noted that in many Member States there was a practice of not reading a judgment aloud but of depositing the judgment in a registry accessible to the public. Convention cannot have overlooked that fact, even if concern to take it into account is not so easily identifiable in their working documents as in the travaux préparatoires of the 1966 Covenant', wrote the Plenary Court, saying that it did not 'feel bound to adopt a literal interpretation'.²³⁹

The European Court declined to find a violation in a case where the tribunal of first instance held a public hearing yet did not pronounce a judgment in public; however, the appellate court delivered its judgment, which included a summary of the impugned decision, in public.²⁴⁰ On the other hand, the provision was breached in a case concerning compensation for detention where hearings of two levels of jurisdiction were held in camera and where the judgments of both tribunals were not delivered publicly and were not otherwise accessible.²⁴¹ In another case where the hearing itself was not public, merely allowing access to the case file by those who could establish a legal interest was not consistent with article 6(1).²⁴² Concealment of an entire decision from public scrutiny because the matter concerned national security was held to be unwarranted: 'Indeed, even in indisputable national security cases, such as those relating to terrorist activities, the authorities of countries which have already suffered and are currently at risk of terrorist attacks have chosen to keep secret only those parts of their decisions whose disclosure would compromise national security or the safety of others . . . thus illustrating that there exist techniques which can accommodate legitimate security concerns without fully negating fundamental procedural guarantees such as the publicity of judicial decisions.'²⁴³

Reservations to the Convention with respect to the right to a public hearing are discussed below under the heading 'Reservations'.

Reasonable time

The right to a trial within a reasonable time applies to both civil and criminal proceedings. In criminal trials, the issue of delay may also be governed by article 5(3), to the extent that the individual is detained. The rationale for the principle, in criminal proceedings, 'is based on the need to ensure that accused persons do not have to remain too long in a state of uncertainty as to the outcome of the criminal accusations against them'.²⁴⁴ Furthermore, 'the vicissitudes of criminal proceedings that remain pending for too long generally also harm the reputation of the alleged offender'.²⁴⁵ The Court has explained that 'the reason it has been led to rule on so many length-of-proceedings cases is because certain Contracting Parties have for years failed to comply with the "reasonable time" requirement under Article 6 § 1 and have not provided a domestic remedy for this type of complaint'.²⁴⁶

The Committee of Ministers has declared that excessive length of proceedings 'is by far the most common issue raised in applications to the Court and that it thereby represents an immediate threat to the effectiveness of the Court and hence the human rights protection system based upon the Convention'.²⁴⁷ It has called upon Member States to ensure that mechanisms and remedies exist to deal with the problem, that reasonable amounts of compensation be awarded in the case of breaches of the rule, and that there is 'a strong but rebuttable presumption that excessively long proceedings will occasion non-pecuniary damage'.²⁴⁸ It has also urged States to consider forms of non-monetary redress such as a reduction of sanctions or discontinuance of proceedings, and that such measures be retroactive in appropriate circumstances.²⁴⁹

To borrow the words of John Selden, 'reasonable time' is a roguish thing, and rather like the Chancellor's foot it may be long, or short, or indeterminate, depending upon many factors. In attempting to set guidelines for application of the principle of trial within a reasonable time, the case law does little more than proclaim that this is to be assessed 'in the light of the particular circumstances of the case . . . in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and the conduct of the competent authorities'.²⁵⁰ Although the subject seems to resist mathematical analysis, two commentators have suggested what they describe as a 3–5–7 schematic for criminal proceedings: less than three years and the Court is unlikely to find an infringement, more than seven and it will usually consider there is a violation. The threshold between reasonable and unreasonable is around five years, 'where the different criteria interact in a difficult puzzle and where predicting an outcome seems the most hazardous'.²⁵¹

With respect to the conduct of the authorities, unjustified delays and periods of inactivity during the investigation are relevant.²⁵² The Court considers that although it is not in a position to examine the juridical quality of domestic justice systems, where there is repeated remittal of cases for re-examination because of errors committed by lower courts within the same set of proceedings, this indicates 'a serious deficiency in the judicial system' imputable to the State in the determination of reasonable time.²⁵³ In the case of litigation between private parties, the State cannot be considered responsible for delays in the same way as if it were itself a party to proceedings, as in criminal and administrative matters. Nevertheless, each State is required 'to equip itself with legal instruments which are adequate and sufficient to ensure the fulfilment of positive obligations imposed upon the State'.²⁵⁴ Delays by judges in delivering their decisions are imputable to the State and are taken into account in the calculation of 'reasonable time'.²⁵⁵ Execution of the final judgment is considered to be an integral part of the 'trial' for the purposes of assessing the criterion of reasonable time,²⁵⁶ although there may be circumstances justifying delay in some cases.²⁵⁷

In criminal matters, the 'reasonable time' determination begins from the moment the person is 'charged' with a criminal offence. This is 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he has committed a criminal offence', a definition that also corresponds to the test whether 'the situation of the [suspect] has been substantially affected'.²⁵⁸ Police and prosecution activity prior to that date may also be relevant to the extent that they impact upon the overall fairness of the trial.²⁵⁹ In examining the complexity of the case, consideration will be given to such factors as the number of defendants.²⁶⁰ Economic crimes are often relatively complicated,²⁶¹ although this is hardly a presumption. If the accused has used sophisticated legal structures that impede the work of investigators, the Court will take this into account.²⁶² There is a 'particular obligation of expedition on the State' when criminal proceedings begin a significant period of time after the impugned events.²⁶³ Even where the accused is entitled to apply for an expedited hearing date and fails to do so, this does not exempt the State from its responsibility for holding the trial within a reasonable time.²⁶⁴ In criminal trials, the 'reasonable time' continues until the proceedings when sentence is fixed.²⁶⁵

In non-criminal matters, the starting point for determination of the 'reasonable time' may begin even before issuance of the writ commencing proceedings in the court to which the dispute is submitted, for example in cases where proceedings cannot be initiated until some preliminary procedural step has been taken such as applying for an administrative decision.²⁶⁶ In legal systems where a plaintiff may join criminal proceedings as a partie civile, the period taken into consideration for the length of proceedings with respect to that person starts on the date he or she joins the criminal proceedings.²⁶⁷ Although the parties to civil proceedings may have the primary responsibility for ensuring that proceedings take place within a reasonable time by means of procedural tools to prevent one party delaying things, 'the domestic courts retain an obligation to ensure compliance with the guarantees of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention'.²⁶⁸

Independent and impartial tribunal established by law

A fair trial must be conducted before an 'independent and impartial tribunal established by law'. As the Grand Chamber has explained, 'it is of fundamental importance in a democratic society that the courts inspire confidence in the public and above all, as far as criminal proceedings are concerned, in the accused'.²⁶⁹ Consequently, '[t]o that end Article 6 requires a tribunal falling within its scope to be impartial'.²⁷⁰ According to the Plenary Court, 'a "tribunal" is characterised in the substantive sense of the term by its judicial function, that is to say determining matters within its competence on the basis of rules of law and after proceedings conducted in a prescribed manner'.²⁷¹ In addition, it must satisfy 'a series of further requirements—independence, in particular of the executive; impartiality; duration of its members' terms of office; guarantees afforded by its procedure—several of which appear in the text' of article 6(1).²⁷²

Although the case law focuses on the issue of impartiality, article 6(1) also requires that the tribunal be independent. Independence of a tribunal points to a separation of powers, something that is fundamental to the rule of law. Specific features of the judicial framework may be relevant to independence, such as adequate remuneration for judges, protection against dismissal, and terms of sufficient length. Useful reference in this respect can be made to the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, adopted by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders in 1985 and subsequently endorsed by the United Nations General Assembly.²⁷³ Principle 1 affirms: 'The independence of the judiciary shall be guaranteed by the State and enshrined in the Constitution or the law of the country. It is the duty of all governmental and other institutions to respect and observe the independence of the judiciary.' But from the standpoint of individual rights, the independence of the judiciary is a means to an end, namely, the impartiality of the judge charged with the case.

In particular, a court or tribunal must be independent of the executive and of the parties to the case. The European Court will look at such factors as the manner of appointment of the members of the adjudicative body, the duration of their term of office, the existence of guarantees against outside pressures, and the appearance of independence.²⁷⁴ Security of tenure, sometimes called 'irremovability' or 'inamovability', should 'in general be considered as a corollary of their independence', although the absence of such protection in law is not decisive if the principle is recognized in fact and associated with other necessary guarantees.²⁷⁵ In a very recent decision, the Grand Chamber explained that the notion of the separation of powers between the political organs of government and the judiciary has assumed growing importance in the Court's case law.²⁷⁶ Nevertheless, 'appointment of judges by the executive or the legislature is permissible, provided that appointees are free from influence or pressure when carrying out their adjudicatory role'.²⁷⁷

Assessing the independence of the war crimes chambers in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the European Court noted that the presence of international judges was intended to reassure those concerned about independence of the judiciary. This could not really be in doubt. The Court considered such factors as the mode of appointment (by the High Representative designed by the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe, upon the recommendation of 'the highest judicial figures in Bosnia and Herzegovina'), the taking of a solemn oath, the fact that they were drawn from professional judges in their countries of origin, and the term of office ('admittedly ... rather short').²⁷⁸ In a Polish case, the European Court considered that the independence of an assessor in a criminal court was not satisfactorily assured, 'the reason being that she could have been removed by the Minister of Justice at any time during her term of office and that there were no adequate guarantees protecting her against the arbitrary exercise of that power by the Minister'.²⁷⁹

Impartiality 'normally denotes the absence of prejudice or bias'.²⁸⁰ In determining whether a tribunal is impartial within the meaning of article 6(1), two tests are applied, the first described as 'subjective' and the second as 'objective'. The subjective test involves determining whether the personal convictions of a particular judge in a particular case are relevant. If issues in this respect are raised, an assessment must then be made as to whether the judge provided sufficient guarantees, including the composition of the tribunal, to remove any legitimate doubt concerning a lack of impartiality.²⁸¹ Although the Court generally focuses on the subjective test, 'there is no watertight division between subjective and objective impartiality since the conduct of a judge may not only prompt objectively held misgivings as to impartiality from the point of view of the external observer (objective test) but may also go to the issue of his or her personal conviction (subjective test)'.²⁸² The mere fact that a judge has participated in previous cases involving the same issues or offences does not justify concerns about impartiality.²⁸³ A judge who has conducted in absentia proceedings is not subsequently barred from sitting in the same case when the accused person appears.²⁸⁴ Suspicions of a lack of impartiality do not arise when the same judge re-considers a case that he or she has already examined at first instance but where the initial decision was quashed on appeal.²⁸⁵

There is a strong presumption that a professional judge in the domestic legal system is impartial, absent evidence to the contrary.²⁸⁶ The presumption may be rebutted if there is evidence to establish that the judge has shown personal bias, for example by displaying hostility or ill will.²⁸⁷ It is a very rare occurrence for the Court to conclude that the presumption of personal impartiality has been rebutted. Exceptionally, a majority of the European Court noted several factors that compromised the impartiality of Cypriot judges in a contempt of court proceeding: the judges stated that they had been personally insulted and offended by the applicant's words; their emphatic language 'conveyed a sense of indignation and shock'; they deemed a sentence of five days' imprisonment to be the only adequate response for the contempt in question; early in the hearing they expressed the view that a contempt had been committed.²⁸⁸ Dissenting judges Bratza and Pellonpää considered that 'none of these factors, whether considered individually or cumulatively, are sufficient to rebut the strong presumption, consistently applied by the Court, that professional judges are free from personal bias'.²⁸⁹

It may be difficult to produce evidence capable of rebutting the presumption of impartiality in a subjective sense. For this reason, the requirement of objective impartiality provides an additional guarantee.²⁹⁰ The objective test focuses on the existence of hierarchical or other links between the judge and participants in the proceedings that justify misgivings about impartiality.²⁹¹ Other factors include the existence of national procedures that are aimed at ensuring impartiality, such as rules governing the withdrawal of judges.²⁹² The fear of bias by the applicant is not irrelevant, but something more objective is required.²⁹³ Nevertheless, appearances are important because 'justice must not only be done, it must also be seen to be done'.²⁹⁴ The reason for this is the need for public confidence in the courts.²⁹⁵

Reasoned decision

A court or tribunal contemplated by article 6(1) is 'under a duty to conduct a proper examination of the submissions, arguments and evidence adduced by the parties, without prejudice to its assessment of whether they are relevant for its decision'.²⁹⁶ The purpose of this is to satisfy the parties that they have been heard, 'thereby contributing to a more willing acceptance of the decision on their part'.²⁹⁷ It also obliges judges to base their reasoning on objective arguments as well as preserving the rights of the defence.²⁹⁸ A reasoned judgment is very much of a prerequisite for a meaningful appeal, something that is required in the case of a criminal conviction by article 2 of Protocol No. 7.

The scope of the obligation to provide reasons will vary according to the nature of the decision and must be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case.²⁹⁹ The European Court takes into account 'the diversity of the submissions that a litigant may bring before the courts and the differences existing in the Contracting States with regard to statutory provisions, customary rules, legal opinion and the presentation and drafting of judgments'.³⁰⁰ A detailed answer to every argument that has been raised is not required.³⁰¹ But where a higher court only provides sparse reasons, for example by incorporating the reasons of a lower court in its decision, it must be clear that it addressed the essential issues and did not merely endorse the findings of the lower court. This requirement is particularly important where the litigant has not been able to make oral representations.³⁰²

In many Council of Europe States, lay juries sit in judgment, particularly for serious crimes. This is 'guided by the legitimate desire to involve citizens in the administration of justice'.³⁰³ The configurations of such juries and their tasks vary considerably from one country to another, something that is often a function of history, culture, and traditions. Where juries sit in so-called 'assize courts', they are generally not required and are sometimes expressly forbidden to provide reasons for their decisions. In such cases, article 6 obviously does not require a detailed judgment but it does dictate an assessment that there are sufficient safeguards to avoid a risk of arbitrariness and to enable the accused to understand the reasons for his or her conviction.³⁰⁴ Examples of such safeguards are the requirement that the presiding judge provide direction or guidance on the legal and factual issues and that questions from the jury be answered in a precise and unequivocal manner.³⁰⁵

Presumption of innocence (art. 6(2))

The presumption of innocence benefits everyone charged with a criminal offence until proved guilty according to law. Enshrined in a distinct provision, the presumption of innocence is nevertheless a constituent element of the right to a fair trial in criminal proceedings set out more generally in article 6(1).³⁰⁶ It is a fundamental feature of criminal justice first stated in the context of international law in article 11(1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: 'Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law...' The wording of article 6(2) of the Convention is largely identical, although it may be argued that the Universal Declaration provision is slightly broader in scope due to its reference to 'penal offence' in contrast with the Convention's 'criminal offence'. In the French version, the Declaration refers to acte délictueux and the Convention to infraction.

In its General Comment on fair trial rights, issued in 2007, the United Nations Human Rights Committee said, in respect of the presumption of innocence:

The presumption of innocence, which is fundamental to the protection of human rights, imposes on the prosecution the burden of proving the charge, guarantees that no guilt can be presumed until the charge has been proved beyond reasonable doubt, ensures that the accused has the benefit of doubt, and requires that persons accused of a criminal act must be treated in accordance with this principle. It is a duty for all public authorities to refrain from prejudging the outcome of a trial, e.g. by abstaining from making public statements affirming the guilt of the accused. Defendants should normally not be shackled or kept in cages during trials or otherwise presented to the court in a manner indicating that they may be dangerous criminals. The media should avoid news coverage undermining the presumption of innocence. Furthermore, the length of pre-trial detention should never be taken as an indication of guilt and its degree. The denial of bail or findings of liability in civil proceedings do not affect the presumption of innocence.³⁰⁷

Onus and burden of proof

Most of article 6 concerns rights that are essentially procedural or evidentiary in nature. But by entrenching the presumption of innocence in the Convention, article 6 confirms that fairness also has a substantive dimension. The central manifestation of the presumption of innocence in the criminal trial is the imposition of an onus or burden of proof upon the prosecution.³⁰⁸ This is a particular aspect of a more general principle of law by which the party that invokes a right has the burden of proof: Ei incumbit probatio qui dicit, non qui negat. In the criminal law context, it is elevated to a norm of more fundamental importance. Within criminal justice, the presumption of innocence extends well beyond the actual trial as such. For example, it applies to government officials who make statements or declarations about the guilt of a person when trial is pending, and even to the media. It also extends after the trial in cases where the accused is acquitted³⁰⁹ or the proceedings discontinued.³¹⁰

Sometimes, criminal justice legislation or judicial practice reverses the burden of proof, with the consequence that the accused is obliged to produce evidence, and often to testify, in order to rebut a presumption of fact or of law. Obviously, this raises problems with respect to the presumption of innocence. The Convention does not prohibit presumptions of fact or of law in criminal cases. Some evidentiary presumptions are almost inherent in the fact-finding process and result from common sense rather than a legislated provision. An example is the presumption that individuals intend the consequences of their acts or the presumption that an individual is legally sane at the time of the alleged crime.

However, the presumption of innocence requires States 'to remain within certain limits in this respect', in that they must 'take into account the importance of what is at stake and maintain the rights of the defence'.³¹¹ Legislation by which the director of a media firm is presumed to be liable for dissemination of defamatory statements by virtue of his or her position, 'having regard to what [is] at stake', was not deemed to be within 'reasonable limits' and therefore not contrary to article 6(2).³¹² Presumptions created to deal with smuggling have been deemed compatible with the Convention, notably because judges mitigated their strictness and did not automatically rely upon them.³¹³ Tax legislation imposing various surcharges on the basis of presumptions was deemed to be within reasonable limits, in part because 'an efficient system of taxation is important to the State's financial interests' but also because they allowed for 'certain means of defence based on subjective elements'.³¹⁴ In drug prosecutions, presumptions that property was derived from the proceeds of trafficking have also been deemed compatible with the Convention, bearing in mind how the courts applied them.³¹⁵ On the other hand, presumptions of law and fact that led to an automatic conviction for false denunciation of a person who complained of sexual assault because the prosecutor had decided to discontinue the case was judged to breach article 6(2) of the Convention.³¹⁶ The Court held there was a violation of the presumption of innocence in a prosecution for driving too fast where the only evidence was a speed recording of the car of which the accused person was the registered keeper, but there was no evidence as to the identity of the driver. The registered keeper presented evidence that he had not been driving the car and was not even in the country at the time, but this was inadequate to overturn the legislated presumption. The Court said it could not find 'that in such a situation the only common-sense conclusion was that the applicant himself had been the driver'.³¹⁷ In traffic offences where fines are imposed on the owner on the grounds that at the very least he or she has been negligent in letting others use the vehicle, there should not be a problem with article 6(2).³¹⁸

Although not strictly speaking a presumption of fact or law, so-called strict or absolute liability offences make it impossible for an accused person to argue that he or she did not have knowledge of an element of the crime and therefore lacked the criminal intent. For example, in prosecutions for rape of a child, many national criminal codes do not require evidence that the perpetrator had knowledge of the child's age. The Court has held that this does not raise issues under article 6 of the Convention.³¹⁹

The burden of proof should not be confused with the standard of proof. Within the Council of Europe, the formulation of the standard of proof in a criminal trial varies somewhat. Common law jurisdictions generally refer to the notion of proof beyond reasonable doubt, whereas continental systems of the Romano-Germanic tradition use formulations like the intime conviction of the judge of fact. The Court has not explicitly recognized the 'beyond reasonable doubt' standard, a norm whose international status is confirmed by its inclusion in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.³²⁰ It has nevertheless stated that the presumption of innocence requires that 'any doubt should benefit the accused'.³²¹ Reversal of the burden of proof is closely related to guarantees against self-incrimination and the right to silence, which are not explicitly addressed in the European Convention and the Protocols. In practice, a reversed burden is generally aimed at forcing the accused to testify. The rationale is that the accused is in possession of information that cannot be obtained otherwise.

Protection against self-incrimination

One facet of the presumption of innocence is the privilege against self-incrimination. It is closely related to the notion of burden of proof and the idea that the accused person should not contribute to or participate in meeting the evidentiary threshold. The Court has referred to a 'right not to incriminate oneself',³²² explaining that it is primarily concerned with 'respecting the will of an accused person to remain silent'.³²³ It has identified the right within the general scope of article 6(1), while acknowledging that it is 'closely linked to the presumption of innocence'.³²⁴ Article 14(3)(g) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides explicitly for the right of a person charged with a criminal offence '[n]ot to be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt'. Several cases before the European Court have applied the 'right not to incriminate oneself' to proceedings involving prosecution of car owners for moving vehicle infractions whereby they would be convicted unless they identified the driver.³²⁵ But 'as commonly understood', the principle does not extend to the use of material obtained from the accused through use of compulsion but which exists independently of the will of the accused, such as documents acquired pursuant to a warrant, breath, blood, and urine samples and bodily tissue for the purpose of DNA testing.³²⁶ Protection against self-incrimination is also related to access to counsel at the earliest stage in an investigation, at a time when the suspect is most vulnerable and susceptible to infringements of the right not to incriminate oneself.³²⁷ It is often at that point that the accused person makes an incriminating statement to the authorities, something that more or less tips the balance against him or her in all subsequent proceedings.

The right not to incriminate oneself is not confined to admissions of wrongdoing and directly incriminating remarks. Some statements obtained through legal compulsion may not be incriminating on their face yet later be relevant in a criminal prosecution in such a way as to contribute to proof of guilt, for example when it is used to discredit other testimony of an accused. This may be especially harmful in a trial by jury; where professional judges are the triers of fact, the danger of a violation is much less apparent.³²⁸ Consequently, 'what is of the essence in this context is the use to which evidence obtained under compulsion is put in the course of the criminal trial'.³²⁹

It is not uncommon for individuals accused of participating in the same crime to be tried separately. As a consequence, in the trial of one of the suspects there may be expressions about the guilt of others who have not yet been tried. In principle, this may result in infringements of the presumption of innocence.³³⁰ Statements in the first trial may have a prejudicial effect upon subsequent proceedings involving other defendants who are not present or directly involved and who are without means to contest allegations that directly concern them.³³¹ The Court has said that it accepts the fact that 'in complex criminal proceedings involving several persons who cannot be tried together, references by the trial court to the participation of third persons, who may later be tried separately, may be indispensable for the assessment of the guilt of those who are on trial'. However, where such facts must be introduced, 'the court should avoid giving more information than necessary for the assessment of the legal responsibility of those persons who are accused in the trial before it'.³³²

Negative comments and publicity

Negative pre-trial publicity may compromise the presumption of innocence. It can influence public opinion about the guilt of the accused person and directly impact on the impartiality of jurors.³³³ There is a tension with the right to information, to which the general public is entitled pursuant to article 10(1) of the European Convention. But this must be balanced with the right to a fair trial, and specifically the presumption of innocence. Where a virulent press campaign surrounds a trial, 'what is decisive is not the subjective apprehensions of the suspect concerning the absence of prejudice required of the trial courts, however understandable, but whether, in the particular circumstances of the case, his fears can be held to be objectively justified'.³³⁴

In a case involving prosecution for corruption of a senior Turkish official, the Court considered the seriousness of the case and noted that although 'certaines appellations dont le requérant a fait l'objet puissent sembler destinées à impressionner le public', the press coverage consisted essentially of reports of objective facts and of the public reaction. It added that 'dans une société démocratique, des commentaires sévères faits par la presse sont parfois inévitables dans une affaire sensible faisant référence à des événements qui concernent l'intérêt public'.³³⁵ It reached a similar result in a Georgian case.³³⁶ Factors that will be considered will include the temporal proximity of the negative publicity to the trial itself,³³⁷ and the involvement of professional judges rather than lay jurors as finders of fact.³³⁸

The Court has explained that article 6(2) 'is aimed at preventing the undermining of a fair criminal trial by prejudicial statements made in close connection with those proceedings'.³³⁹ It does not 'prevent the authorities from informing the public of criminal investigations in progress, but it requires that they do so with all the discretion and circumspection necessary if the presumption of innocence is to be respected'.³⁴⁰ A fundamental distinction is made between a statement indicating that an individual is suspected of having committed a crime and a clear declaration, absent a final conviction, that the person is criminally responsible.³⁴¹ According to the Court, 'the presumption of innocence will be violated if a judicial decision or a statement by a public official concerning a person charged with a criminal offence reflects an opinion that he is guilty before he has been proved guilty according to law'.³⁴² In assessing the content of impugned declarations there can be a breach of the presumption of innocence even in the absence of any formal finding to the extent 'that there is some reasoning suggesting that the court or the official regards the accused as guilty'.³⁴³ Not only does article 6(2) prohibit any premature finding by the court or tribunal itself,³⁴⁴ the presumption of innocence also covers statements made by public officials about criminal investigations that encourage a public belief in the guilt of the individual in question as well as prejudice the findings of the competent judicial authority.³⁴⁵ More generally, the presumption of innocence imposes restrictions upon the conduct of authorities of the State outside of the courtroom.³⁴⁶ Public officials, including prosecutors and judges, may make statements about the guilt of an accused prior to any judicial determination and therefore while the individual still benefits from the presumption of innocence.³⁴⁷ Where a prosecutor explained that a criminal case was being discontinued but that there was no doubt about the guilt of the accused person, the Court said there was a violation of the presumption of innocence. But in another case where the prosecutor issued a decision stating that guilt had been 'proved' before the judgment had been rendered, the Court said that although the choice of the word was 'unfortunate', when 'seen in its proper context, the term signified no more than the prosecution's view that the case file disclosed sufficient evidence of the applicant's guilt to justify proceeding to trial'.³⁴⁸ Public officials must choose their words carefully when they speak about pending criminal proceedings.³⁴⁹ The Court will be more exigent when the statement is made by politicians who are also acting in their capacity as public officials because it is more difficult to dismiss their comments as 'part of a legitimate political debate, which might arguably allow a certain degree of exaggeration and liberal use of value judgments with reference to political rivals'.³⁵⁰

When criminal proceedings terminate in either discontinuance or an acquittal, the individual concerned is in principle no longer charged with a criminal offence. This does not, however, mean that article 6(2) cannot apply. The Court has considered its application in a number of subsequent proceedings concerning such matters as an

the presumption of innocence means that where there has been a criminal charge and criminal proceedings have ended in an acquittal, the person who was the subject of the criminal proceedings is innocent in the eyes of the law and must be treated in a manner consistent with that innocence.

To this extent, therefore, the presumption of innocence will remain after the conclusion of criminal proceedings in order to ensure that, as regards any charge which was not proven, the innocence of the person in question is respected. This overriding concern lies at the root of the Court's approach to the applicability of Article 6 § 2 in these cases.³⁶³

A review of the case law shows that 'there is no single approach to ascertaining the circumstances in which that Article will be violated in the context of proceedings which follow the conclusion of criminal proceedings'.³⁶⁴ Much depends on the nature and context of the proceedings.

In order to avail of article 6(2) under such circumstances, the individual must be able to demonstrate that there is a link between the concluded criminal proceedings and the subsequent proceedings. According to the Grand Chamber, '[s]uch a link is likely to be present, for example, where the subsequent proceedings require examination of the outcome of the prior criminal proceedings and, in particular, where they oblige the court to analyse the criminal judgment; to engage in a review or evaluation of the evidence in the criminal file; to assess the applicant's participation in some or all of the events leading to the criminal charge; or to comment on the subsisting indications of the applicant's possible guilt'.³⁶⁵ In particular, the Court will look to the language used by the decision-maker to determine whether the presumption of innocence has been breached. Where the domestic court said it was 'clearly probable' that the person had 'committed the offences... with which he was charged', it considered that doubts had been cast on the acquittal and that the presumption of innocence had thereby been compromised.³⁶⁶ The European Court does not look favourably on decisions that refer to the earlier decision of the criminal court as having failed to dispel suspicions of guilt.³⁶⁷ However, 'even the use of some unfortunate language may not be decisive'.³⁶⁸

In some legal systems, a civil claim by the victim may be lodged even after the person who is allegedly responsible for the act has been acquitted. The Court considers that 'while exoneration from criminal liability ought to be respected in the civil compensation proceedings, it should not preclude the establishment of civil liability to pay compensation arising out of the same facts on the basis of a less strict burden of proof'.³⁶⁹ Nor do disciplinary proceedings arising out of the same facts as a criminal charge become impossible simply because the person in question has been acquitted at trial or the case discontinued. Disciplinary bodies may make their own independent findings of fact based upon a different standard of proof.³⁷⁰

Compensation

The presumption of innocence does not entitle a person who is detained prior to and during trial to claim compensation if ultimately acquitted. A considerably limited right to compensation is recognized by article 5(5) of the Convention, but it requires more than an acquittal because the applicant must show that the detention itself was wrongful in the sense of article 5.³⁷¹ In the event of detention following a miscarriage of justice, article 3 of Protocol No. 7 also entitles a victim to compensation. Again, however, this is not in any sense a corollary of the presumption of innocence. A refusal of compensation does not in and of itself raise an issue concerning the presumption of innocence.³⁷² The Court has noted that there is great diversity among European States on compensation for a person who is detained during the proceedings and then acquitted. It has found that in most States, compensation is conditional on the applicant's conduct prior to or during trial, or it is simply left to the discretion of the courts.³⁷³

In States where some form of compensation is not infrequently granted when a person who has been detained is then acquitted by a final judgment, it is not permissible for national courts to speculate about the guilt of the individual. An acquittal is not necessarily a finding of innocence. But if the individual is presumed innocent until convicted in accordance with article 6(2), then the presumption is left undisturbed by the acquittal. The Court has said that 'the voicing of suspicions regarding an accused's innocence is conceivable as long as the conclusion of criminal proceedings has not resulted in a decision on the merits of the accusation. However, it is no longer admissible to rely on such suspicions once an acquittal has become final.'³⁷⁴ Nor can an applicant for compensation following an acquittal be required to prove he or she is innocent. In compensation proceedings, '[r]equiring a person to establish his or her innocence, which suggests that the court regards that person as guilty, is unreasonable and discloses an infringement of the presumption of innocence'.³⁷⁵

Article 6(2) also protects individuals who have been acquitted of a crime, or where prosecution has been discontinued, from being treated by public officials as if they are actually guilty.³⁷⁶ Failure to ensure respect for the acquittal or the discontinuation decision could make the protection of article 6(2) theoretical and illusory, threatening the person's reputation and how the public perceives him or her. One of the functions of article 6(2) is 'to protect an acquitted person's reputation from statements or acts that follow an acquittal which would seem to undermine it'.³⁷⁷ In this context, the Court has said that to a certain extent article 6(2) overlaps with the protection provided by article 8(1).³⁷⁸ But in a case involving accusations by a government minister that persons had breached United Nations Security Council resolutions, the Court found the link with a 'criminal offence' to be too remote and held that article 6(2) did not apply.³⁷⁹

Minimum guarantees in criminal prosecutions

In criminal trials, the general rules about fairness that apply to all judicial proceedings in accordance with article 6(1) are complemented by special rules, some of which are set out expressly in article 6(3) and some of which have been developed in the case law of the Court given the special nature of criminal trials. The English text of article 6(3) refers to 'minimum guarantees', indicating clearly that there is no intention to exclude other protections of an accused person. The French text uses the word notamment, implying that article 6(3) is a non-exhaustive enumeration and that the Court may add rights to the provision that are not expressly set out.³⁸⁰ In criminal proceedings the Court generally examines fairness applying paragraphs 1 and 3 of article 6 together,³⁸¹ treating the requirements of article 6(3) as particular aspects of the right to a fair trial guaranteed by paragraph 1. Article 6(3) applies to anyone 'charged with a criminal offence', possibly a larger formulation than that used in article 6(1) ('[i]n the determination of... any criminal charge against him'). Arguably, article 6(1) applies to the criminal trial itself, whereas article 6(3) is clearly operative well before the trial and from the moment when the individual is 'charged'. The case law has not insisted upon this distinction, however, as can be seen in 'reasonable time' cases under article 6(1), where the clock starts to run from the moment the person is charged and not from the beginning of the trial itself.³⁸² One judgment states that 'Article 6—especially paragraph 3—may be relevant before a case is sent for trial if and so far as the fairness of the trial is likely to be seriously prejudiced by an initial failure to comply with its provisions.'³⁸³

The right of access to a court, held to be a general principle as part of the right to a fair trial under article 6, 'is no more absolute in criminal than in civil matters'.³⁸⁴ Examples of implied limitations include a decision not to prosecute and an order for discontinuance of proceedings.³⁸⁵ Nor is there any right under article 6 to a particular outcome of criminal proceedings, such as a formal conviction or an acquittal after charges have been laid.³⁸⁶

Information about nature and cause of charge (art. 6(3)(a))

The first of the minimum rights to which a person charged with a criminal offence is entitled is 'to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him'. As the Grand Chamber has explained, '[p]articulars of the offence play a crucial role in the criminal process, in that it is from the moment of their service that the suspect is formally put on notice of the factual and legal basis of the charges against him'.³⁸⁷ The defendant must not only be informed of the cause of the charge, which is to say the acts alleged and on which the charge is based, but also their legal characterization.³⁸⁸ An accused person who is not familiar with the language used by the criminal tribunal is at a particular disadvantage.³⁸⁹ In order to avoid contestation on this point, the authorities will often include, in any statement by the suspect or accused person following questioning, a reference to the fact that he or she has been informed of the charges.³⁹⁰

The scope of article 6(3)(a) must be assessed within the framework of the general right to a fair trial enshrined in article 6(1).³⁹¹ Paragraphs (a) and (b) of article 6(3) are connected because the right to be informed of the nature and the cause of the charges is related to the right to prepare the defence.³⁹² Article 6(3)(a) does not, however, impose any particular form in which this information is to be communicated.³⁹³ Although there is no specific requirement that the information be provided in writing or that a translation be given in writing, article 6(3)(a) 'does point to the need for special attention to be paid to the notification of the "accusation" to the defendant. An indictment plays a crucial role in the criminal process, in that it is from the moment of its service that the defendant is formally put on notice of the factual and legal basis of the charges against him'.³⁹⁴

Adequate time and facilities for defence (art. 6(3)(b))

Any person charged with a criminal offence is entitled to 'to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence'. The provision implies that substantive defence activity on behalf of the accused may comprise everything 'necessary' to prepare the main trial.³⁹⁵ The French text makes this clearer, using the word nécessaires, as the European Commission of Human Rights observed.³⁹⁶ The accused must have the opportunity to organize his or her defence in an appropriate way and without restriction as to the opportunity to put all relevant defence arguments before the trial court and thus to influence the outcome of the proceedings.³⁹⁷ This includes the opportunity to become acquainted with results of investigations carried out throughout the proceedings.³⁹⁸ The defendant should have unrestricted access to the case file and unrestricted use of any notes, including, if necessary, the possibility of obtaining copies of relevant documents.³⁹⁹

Sub-paragraph (b) of article 6(3) is connected to sub-paragraph (a), in that the right to be informed of the nature and the cause of the charge is necessary for the preparation of the defence.⁴⁰⁰ It is also related to sub-paragraph (c) in that denial of access to counsel may also be associated with insufficient time and facilities to prepare a defence.⁴⁰¹ In particular, 'an applicant who represents himself must be given time and facilities for the preparation of his defence that would be adequate in his particular circumstances'.⁴⁰²

The Court has explained that 'national judges have a very difficult task in balancing the need to ensure that the defendant has adequate time to prepare his case and the need to ensure that the trial progresses in a reasonably expeditious way'.⁴⁰³ The main concern should be fair treatment of the accused, but 'this does not mean that the court must accede to every request made by the defendant'.⁴⁰⁴

The adequacy of the time and facilities afforded to an accused must be assessed in the light of the circumstances of each particular case.⁴⁰⁵ A period of a few hours in an administrative case that was 'not a complex one' was nevertheless judged inadequate and a violation of the right protected by article 6(3)(b).⁴⁰⁶ Four days for an applicant who was self-represented, and who moreover had to remain handcuffed when studying a file consisting of twenty-eight volumes, was incompatible with article 6(3)(b).⁴⁰⁷ In a case involving a minor theft that was 'neither legally nor factually complex', the applicant knew of the charges two months before the trial, but was not informed about the hearing in time to prepare to participate. The Court considered her right to adequate time had been breached.⁴⁰⁸

Although waiver of rights to a fair trial is not in principle contrary to article 6, it must be unequivocal and accompanied by minimum safeguards commensurate with its importance, and not run counter to any important public interest.⁴⁰⁹ In the case of the right to time and facilities for preparation of the defence, the Court has said there is no public policy reason opposed to waiver 'because the question of time depends primarily on the assessment of the persons concerned; different counsel need different amounts of time to prepare for a case'.⁴¹⁰

In the course of criminal proceedings, the tribunal may decide to reclassify the offence. The European Court considers that this does not violate the right to a fair trial provided that the accused person has sufficient opportunity to defend himself or herself.⁴¹¹

In principle, fairness requires adequate disclosure to the defence, prior to the trial and in sufficient time to enable its effective use in preparing the defence, of any material capable of assisting the defence.⁴¹² In some cases, such as those involving national security issues, an exception to the general rules about disclosure of evidence is allowed on public interest grounds.⁴¹³ One recognized procedure is for the trial judge to examine the sensitive evidence ex parte so as to rule on whether the public interest in secrecy outweighs the value of the material to the defendant.⁴¹⁴ The issue is whether so-called counterbalancing measures will adequately remedy the lack of a full adversarial procedure.⁴¹⁵

Defence in person or legal assistance (art. 6(3)(c))

Sub-paragraph (c) of article 6(3) entitles a person charged with a criminal offence 'to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require'. The right of the accused to participate in the criminal trial, something underscored by the right to be present, also includes the right to receive legal assistance and to follow the proceedings effectively. As the Court has explained, '[s]uch rights are implicit in the very notion of an adversarial procedure', in addition to specific formulations of them in sub-paragraphs (c) and (3) of article 6(3).⁴¹⁶

The right to a lawyer should be available from the initial stages of the proceedings.⁴¹⁷ The issue of access to counsel at an early stage in the proceedings is of particular importance, and the Court has said that this is an important factor in assessing matters such as the protection against self-incrimination. The Court has underlined the importance of the investigation stage for the preparation of the criminal proceedings, in particular because evidence obtained then may determine the framework of the trial, especially with regard to issues of self-incrimination.⁴¹⁸ This is because 'an accused often finds himself in a particularly vulnerable position at that stage of the proceedings, the effect of which is amplified by the fact that legislation on criminal procedure tends to become increasingly complex, notably with respect to the rules governing the gathering and use of evidence'.⁴¹⁹ The vulnerability of the suspect 'can only be properly compensated for by the assistance of a lawyer whose task it is, among other things, to help to ensure respect of the right of an accused not to incriminate himself'.⁴²⁰

Article 6(3)(c) speaks of 'assistance' and not of 'nomination' or 'appointment', an important distinction because mere nomination or appointment does not ensure effective assistance.⁴²¹ A lawyer appointed by legal aid may become indisposed or otherwise be prevented from fulfilling the task of representation.⁴²² The fact of assigning counsel 'does not in itself ensure the effectiveness of the assistance he may afford an accused'.⁴²³ At the same time, the State cannot be held responsible for any shortcomings of a legal aid lawyer or a court-appointed counsel. Conduct of the defence 'is essentially a matter between the defendant and his counsel, whether counsel be appointed under a legal aid scheme or be privately financed'.⁴²⁴ This is a consequence of the independence of the legal profession from the State. The authorities are required to intervene pursuant to article 6(3)(c) only where the failings of a legal aid lawyer in provision of effective representation is 'manifest or sufficiently brought to their attention in some other way'.⁴²⁵

Although an accused is entitled to be defended by counsel 'of his own choosing', the Court has not viewed this as absolute but rather subject to limitations when free legal aid is being provided. The accused does not have a free choice of funded counsel, although the relationship between lawyer and client is important, and consideration must be given to the wishes of the accused in this respect.⁴²⁶

The 'interests of justice' will require that counsel be appointed when effective assistance is necessary, for example where there is a complex written procedure that can only really be completed by a qualified professional.⁴²⁷ A requirement of the law that the accused be assisted by counsel is not incompatible with the Convention, despite the express terms of article 6(3)(c) recognizing the right 'to defend himself in person'.⁴²⁸

Examination of witnesses (art. 6(3)(d))

A person charged with a criminal offence has the right 'to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him'. This is a specific aspect of the right to a fair hearing set out in article 6(1), and the two provisions are therefore examined together.⁴²⁹ The formulation of paragraph (d) reflects the notion of 'equality of arms', an over-arching value that applies to article 6 more generally. Paragraph (d) reflects the need to take into account the variety of criminal procedural regimes within Europe, where the rules governing witness testimony vary considerably. Thus, there is no right to any particular form of availability or examination of witnesses, but the standards must be the same whether they apply to the prosecution or the defence. Admissibility of evidence is primarily a matter for national law, where the domestic courts are best equipped to decide whether it is necessary or advisable to hear a witness. Article 6 does not provide an accused with an unlimited right to secure the appearance of the witness in the court.⁴³⁰

Article 6(3)(d) is considered to require that the accused person 'be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either at the time the witness was making his statement or at some later stage of the proceedings'.⁴³¹ Accordingly, '[a]ll evidence must normally be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument'.⁴³² Although some legal systems, including that of the English common law, generally require personal attendance of witnesses and regard as inadmissible 'hearsay' statements that are made outside of court, the European Court does not consider that evidence of statements obtained at the stage of police inquiry or judicial investigation is in principle incompatible with article 6(3)(d), as long as the rights of the defence are respected.⁴³³

This means, as a rule, that the accused person be provided with 'an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him either when he or she was testifying or at a later stage of the proceedings'.⁴³⁴ In one case, the Court noted that many prosecution witnesses did not attend the hearing, depriving the defendant of the possibility of questioning them in person. It said the State had not shown convincingly that the non-attendance was justified, that a reasonable effort had been made to secure their presence, and that 'there were sufficient counterbalancing factors permitting a fair and proper assessment of the reliability of those statements'.⁴³⁵

Three particular contexts dealing with difficulties in the application of article 6(3)(d) have been identified in the case law of the Court: 'anonymous witnesses' who have their identity concealed as a protective measure;⁴³⁶ 'absent witnesses', where a statement is admitted even though the witness is not present because of death, unavailability, or some other reason;⁴³⁷ and witnesses who invoke a privilege against self-incrimination.⁴³⁸ Related to the problem of absent witnesses is that of particularly vulnerable witnesses, for example in cases of sexual assault. The Court will respect the need for special measures of protection, particularly when the victim is confronted with the presumed aggressor.⁴³⁹ In such circumstances, the Court conducts an overall examination of the fairness of the proceedings, including 'an examination of both the significance of the untested evidence for the case against the accused, namely whether the untested evidence constituted the sole or decisive evidence brought against the applicant... and of the counterbalancing measures taken by the judicial authorities to compensate the handicaps under which the defence had laboured'.⁴⁴⁰ A conviction that is based solely or to a decisive extent on statements by a witness whom the accused has not been able to examine or have examined is as a general rule incompatible with the guarantee set out in paragraph (d) of article 6(3).⁴⁴¹ Described as the 'sole or decisive rule', the Court has said it should nevertheless not be applied in an inflexible manner, as this 'would transform the rule into a blunt and indiscriminate instrument that runs counter to the traditional way in which the Court approaches the issue of the overall fairness of proceedings, namely by weighing in the balance the competing interests of the defence, the victim, and witnesses, and the public interest in the effective administration of justice'.⁴⁴² Accordingly, if a conviction is based solely or decisively on witnesses who cannot be examined by the defence, 'the Court must subject the proceedings to the most searching scrutiny. Because of the dangers of the admission of such evidence, it would constitute a very important factor to balance in the scales and one which would require sufficient counterbalancing factors, including the existence of strong procedural safeguards'.⁴⁴³

Article 6(3)(d) also governs the right of the accused person to obtain the testimony of witnesses. In this respect, the State has a positive obligation,⁴⁴⁴ one that is of means rather than of result. If they show due diligence, the authorities cannot be blamed for the failure to obtain defence witnesses such that the trial will necessarily be deemed unfair.⁴⁴⁵

Interpreter (art. 6(3)(e))

The final sub-paragraph of article 6(3) recognizes the right of a person charged with a criminal offence to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court. Like other components of the right to a fair trial, it is possible to waive the right to an interpreter.⁴⁴⁶

An evaluation of the linguistic abilities of the person charged with an offence is obviously vital to the application of article 6(3)(e). The Court will consider the nature of the offence and communications to the accused person by the domestic authorities so as to assess whether they are sufficiently complex as to require detailed knowledge of the language used during the trial proceedings.⁴⁴⁷ Assessing the language skills of the accused person is primarily a matter for the domestic authorities. In principle, the European Court will not intervene in such determinations. On occasion, however, it makes its own evaluation. Finding that the right to an interpreter of an applicant who was a native Russian speaker was not violated by France, the Court noted that he had been represented by a lawyer at trial and had made no request for an interpreter, he had been assisted by an interpreter in another proceeding six years earlier so he was aware that the request could be made, he had lived and worked in France for six years, and the record relating to his detention indicated that he spoke French.⁴⁴⁸ In a United Kingdom case, problems of comprehension were signalled to the judge by defence counsel when an Italian-speaking accused decided to plead guilty. The judge agreed, although he decided to make do without one, at the invitation of the defence counsel, when a proper interpreter did not attend before the criminal court. Agreeing that this was in principle a matter between the accused and his counsel, the European Court found that 'the ultimate guardian of the fairness of the proceedings was the trial judge who had been clearly apprised of the real difficulties which the absence of interpretation might create for the applicant', holding there was a violation of article 6(3)(e).⁴⁴⁹

The possible need for assistance of an interpreter may arise at the earliest stages in the proceedings. It may even be necessary at the investigation stage. Certainly, article 6(3)(a), requiring that the accused person be informed of the charges, and with which there is a close relationship to article 6(3)(e),⁴⁵⁰ can only operate in a meaningful way if the person actually understands the language in which the communication is provided. The Court has explained that a defendant 'may be at a practical disadvantage if the indictment is not translated into a language which he understands'.⁴⁵¹

The assistance of an interpreter should be provided during the investigating stage unless it is demonstrated in the light of the particular circumstances of each case that there are compelling reasons to restrict this right.⁴⁵² In this respect, attention should be drawn to article 55(1)(c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court providing that any person questioned during an investigation shall, 'if questioned in a language other than a language the person fully understands and speaks, have, free of any cost, the assistance of a competent interpreter and such translations as are necessary to meet the requirements of fairness'.

The right to an interpreter applies not only to oral statements made at trial, but also to documentary material. This means the accused person who cannot understand or speak the language of the court has 'the right to the free assistance of an interpreter for the translation or interpretation of all those documents or statements in the proceedings instituted against him which it is necessary for him to understand or to have rendered into the court's language in order to have the benefit of a fair trial'.⁴⁵³

The European Court has said that Article 6(3)(e) 'does not go so far as to require a written translation of all items of written evidence or official documents in the procedure'.⁴⁵⁴ In a case file of 400,000 pages, the Court said it could not blame the Belgian government for refusing to translate everything into Armenian.⁴⁵⁵ Attention has been drawn to the use of the term 'interpreter' and not 'translator' (in French, the Convention speaks of an interprète), suggesting that oral linguistic assistance may be adequate.⁴⁵⁶ However, interpretation must be sufficient to enable the accused to have knowledge of the case and mount a proper defence, in particular by being able to present the court with his or her version of the events.⁴⁵⁷ Because the right must be practical and effective, the obligation of the competent authorities is not limited to the appointment of an interpreter but, if they are put on notice in the particular circumstances, it may also extend to a degree of subsequent control over the adequacy of the interpretation provided.⁴⁵⁸

Use of the word 'free' (in French, gratuitement) is 'clear and determinate', bearing 'the unqualified meaning they ordinarily have in both of the Court's official languages'.⁴⁵⁹ The case law is unequivocal that the State cannot subsequently attempt to recover the costs from an accused person who is subsequently convicted.⁴⁶⁰ Any contrary interpretation would 'leave in existence the disadvantages that an accused who does not understand or speak the language used in court suffers as compared with an accused who is familiar with that language'.⁴⁶¹ Moreover, in marginal cases an accused person concerned about the costs might forego interpretation, thereby prejudicing the fairness of the proceedings.⁴⁶²

Presence at trial

Nowhere does article 6 declare explicitly that a person 'charged with a criminal offence' is entitled to take part in the hearing, but this is a consequence of 'the object and purpose of the Article taken as a whole'.⁴⁶³ This is confirmed by sub-paragraphs (c), (d), and (e) of paragraph 3. They guarantee to 'everyone charged with a criminal offence' the right 'to defend himself in person', 'to examine or have examined witnesses', and 'to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court'. The Grand Chamber has said that 'it is difficult to see how he could exercise these rights without being present'.⁴⁶⁴ The Court has said the duty to guarantee the right of a criminal defendant to be present in the courtroom—either during the original proceedings or in a retrial—ranks as one of the essential requirements of Article 6.⁴⁶⁵ Article 14(3)(d) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides for the right of an accused person '[t]o be tried in his presence'.

Criminal trial proceedings in the absence of the accused are not incompatible with article 6, and in one form or another take place in most European States.⁴⁶⁶ As the Court has said, 'the impossibility of holding a trial by default may paralyse the conduct of criminal proceedings, in that it may lead, for example, to dispersal of the evidence, expiry of the time-limit for prosecution or a miscarriage of justice'.⁴⁶⁷ But there is a violation of article 6 if a person who is convicted in absentia is unable subsequently to obtain a fresh determination of the merits of the charge, with respect both to questions of law and of fact, if it is not established that the person convicted had earlier waived the right to appear and to defend himself⁴⁶⁸ or had attempted to escape trial.⁴⁶⁹ If proceedings have been conducted in absentia, the refusal to reopen them, absent evidence that the accused has waived the right to be present, has been described as a 'flagrant denial of justice' rendering the proceedings 'manifestly contrary to the provisions of Article 6 or the principles embodied therein'.⁴⁷⁰ The person convicted in absentia must be entitled to participate in new proceedings or proceedings on appeal with the possibility of obtaining admission of new evidence, and obtaining a fresh factual and legal determination.⁴⁷¹

At the same time, the Court has stressed the importance of the accused's appearance, 'both because of his right to a hearing and because of the need to verify the accuracy of his statements and compare them with those of the victim—whose interests need to be protected—and of the witnesses'.⁴⁷² As a result, legislation can discourage unjustified absences, as long as sanctions are not disproportionate and the accused is not deprived of the right to counsel.⁴⁷³

Like other fundamental fair trial rights, the right to be present at trial can be waived by the accused person. This must be established in an unequivocal manner and be attended by safeguards commensurate with its importance.⁴⁷⁴ If an accused person has not been notified in person of the trial, waiver cannot simply be inferred from his or her status as a 'fugitive'.⁴⁷⁵ Even where there is evidence of waiver based upon the conduct of the accused, the consequences of this must have been reasonably foreseeable.⁴⁷⁶ The person concerned must not bear the burden of proving he or she sought to evade justice or that the absence was due to force majeure.⁴⁷⁷ But national authorities are entitled to assess whether the accused showed good cause for absence or whether there was anything to warrant a finding that the absence was due to circumstances beyond his or her control.⁴⁷⁸ There is always the possibility that certain established facts might prove unequivocally that the accused knew of the criminal proceedings and of the nature and cause of the charges, and intentionally avoided appearance. An example might be where the accused states publicly or in writing an intent to defy summonses to appear.⁴⁷⁹ Of course, another example of clear waiver is when the accused misbehaves during the proceedings and is excluded as a result of such conduct.⁴⁸⁰ Even then, the Court bears the responsibility to see that the defence is properly represented and that counsel have been appointed to ensure the trial is fair.⁴⁸¹ Where in absentia proceedings are possible under national law, the right to a defence remains in force and the accused is entitled to be represented by counsel even if he or she is not present in the courtroom.⁴⁸²

Other fundamental fair trial rights are also relevant to criminal proceedings conducted in the absence of the accused. For there to be any legitimacy to a waiver, the accused must have been informed of the accusations, a right assured to criminal defendants by article 6(3)(a).⁴⁸³ The right to be defended by a lawyer, set out in article 6(3)(c), must remain even if the accused is absent.⁴⁸⁴

While attendance of the accused at the trial is fundamental, practice suggests that this is far less important at the appeal stage, where it 'does not take on the same crucial significance'.⁴⁸⁵

Age of criminal responsibility

Nowhere in the fair trial guarantees of the Covenant or the other major international human rights conventions is a minimum age of criminal responsibility set out. That it belongs within the realm of human rights is clear from article 40(3)(a) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child: 'the establishment of a minimum age below which children shall be presumed not to have the capacity to infringe the penal laws'.⁴⁸⁶ The Convention on the Rights of the Child presents this as an issue of 'capacity' and in that sense it is analogous to the issue of fitness to stand trial. However, issues relating to minimum age might also be raised under article 3 or article 8 of the Convention.

A challenge arose in two cases concerning conviction of 11-year-olds for murder in England, where the age of criminal responsibility is set at 10. The Grand Chamber rejected a challenge based upon article 3, where a number of factors, of which age was only one, were raised by the applicant. On the issue of a minimum age for criminal trial, the Grand Chamber noted that there was no commonly accepted minimum age for criminal responsibility in Europe. It acknowledged that most States Parties had an age limit higher than that in force in England and Wales, although some States, such as Cyprus, Ireland, Liechtenstein, and Switzerland, had one that was lower.⁴⁸⁷ The Grand Chamber observed that neither the Convention on the Rights of the Child nor the Beijing Rules⁴⁸⁸ give any indication as to what the minimum age might be. It said that 'the age of ten cannot be said to be so young as to differ disproportionately from the age-limit followed by other European States'.⁴⁸⁹

Nevertheless, in a case involving an 11-year-old who was described as 'intellectually backward' the Court held that he was not able to participate effectively in the trial, resulting in a violation of article 6(1) of the Convention. 'In the case of a child, it is essential that he be dealt with in a manner which takes full account of his age, level of maturity and intellectual and emotional capacities, and that steps are taken to promote his ability to understand and participate in the proceedings', the Court said.⁴⁹⁰ The Court acknowledged that even adults cannot often fully understand complex courtroom proceedings, something that justifies the importance of the right to counsel. However, 'effective participation' requires that 'the accused has a broad understanding of the nature of the trial process and of what is at stake for him or her, including the significance of any penalty which may be imposed'.⁴⁹¹ The Court added that 'when the decision is taken to deal with a child, such as the applicant, who risks not being able to participate effectively because of his young age and limited intellectual capacity, by way of criminal proceedings rather than some other form of disposal directed primarily at determining the child's best interests and those of the community, it is essential that he be tried in a specialist tribunal which is able to give full consideration to, and make proper allowance for, the handicaps under which he labours, and adapt its procedure accordingly'.⁴⁹² More generally, when juvenile defendants are on trial, the proceedings must be organized so as to respect the principle of the best interests of the child. According to the Court, '[i]t is essential that a child charged with an offence is dealt with in a manner which takes full account of his age, level of maturity and intellectual and emotional capacities, and that steps are taken to promote his ability to understand and participate in the proceedings'.⁴⁹³

The right to silence and the protection against self-incrimination are not explicitly set out in article 6, but the Court has deemed them part of its implied content because they are 'generally recognised international standards that lie at the heart of the notion of fair procedure under Article 6'.⁴⁹⁴ In Saunders, the European Court of Human Rights held that the protection against self-incrimination did not apply only to admissions of wrongdoing or to remarks that are directly incriminating. 'Testimony obtained under compulsion which appears on its face to be of a non-incriminating nature—such as exculpatory remarks or mere information on questions of fact—may later be deployed in criminal proceedings in support of the prosecution case, for example to contradict or cast doubt upon other statements of the accused or evidence given by him during the trial to otherwise undermine his credibility', the Court said.⁴⁹⁵ In another case, this finding was extended to the production of documents.⁴⁹⁶

The rationale is to protect the accused against improper compulsion by the authorities, 'thereby contributing to the avoidance of miscarriages of justice'.⁴⁹⁷ The right not to incriminate oneself 'presupposes that the prosecution in a criminal case seek to prove their case against the accused without resort to evidence obtained through methods of coercion or oppression in defiance of the will of the accused'.⁴⁹⁸ The right is closely related to the presumption of innocence enshrined in article 6(2).⁴⁹⁹

Admissibility of evidence

Article 6 does set out any rules on the admissibility of evidence as such. The matter has been treated by the European Court as something to be regulated by national law.⁵⁰⁰ It is 'not the role of the Court to determine, as a matter of principle, whether particular types of evidence—for example, evidence obtained unlawfully in terms of domestic law—may be admissible or, indeed, whether the applicant was guilty or not'.⁵⁰¹ Moreover, the Court has often said that it 'cannot exclude as a matter of principle and in the abstract that unlawfully obtained evidence... may be admissible'.⁵⁰² The question for the Court is 'whether the proceedings as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was obtained, were fair'.⁵⁰³

The obtaining of evidence often raises issues under article 8 of the Convention. However, it is immaterial whether the violation of article 8 results from failure to comply with 'domestic law' or with the Convention.⁵⁰⁴ In Schenk v. Switzerland, a case involving an illegal telephone recording that was used as incriminating evidence, a majority of the Plenary Court concluded that the use of a disputed recording as evidence had not deprived the applicant of a fair trial. It said it 'atrache[d] weight to the fact that the recording of the telephone conversation was not the only evidence on which the conviction was based'.⁵⁰⁵ The minority insisted that '[n]o court can, without detriment to the proper administration of justice, rely on evidence which has been obtained not only by unfair means but, above all, unlawfully. If it does so, the trial cannot be fair within the meaning of the Convention'.⁵⁰⁶ These views were echoed two decades later by several judges of the Grand Chamber.⁵⁰⁷

The same issue was perhaps more difficult when the illegality of the evidence concerned a violation not of article 8 but of article 3. In Jalloh v. Germany, the Court ruled that the use in criminal proceedings of evidence obtained through torture raised serious issues as to the fairness of such proceedings, even if the admission of the evidence in question had not been decisive in securing the suspect's conviction.⁵⁰⁸ It seems that the use of evidence obtained through torture will always breach article 6, even if it is not decisive in the conviction. Article 15 of the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment provides the following: 'Each State Party shall ensure that any statement which is established to have been made as a result of torture shall not be invoked as evidence in any proceedings, except against a person accused of torture as evidence that the statement was made.'⁵⁰⁹ The Torture Convention does not expressly dictate the exclusion of evidence obtained as a result of cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment, and the European Court has not taken a position on this point.⁵¹⁰

Discrimination

Article 14, prohibiting discrimination, applies to article 6 in the same complementary way as it does to the other substantive provisions of the Convention, and it has frequently been invoked in litigation before the Convention organs. However, it appears to have had no real practical application. Sometimes, after finding a violation of article 6, the Court declares that it is unnecessary to examine the complaint separately from the perspective of article 14. On several occasions it has determined that the tribunal was not independent and impartial,⁵¹¹ or that it was not 'established by law',⁵¹² and from this it has proceeded to hold it unnecessary to look further at any other specific violations of article 6 or of article 14.

Sometimes, courts have expressed racist or discriminatory sentiments. This has led to findings of a violation of article 14 combined with article 6. In a case concerning anti-Roma violence that took place in Romania in 1993, the applicants complained that remarks made by the Târgu-Mureş County Court 'contained clear anti-Roma sentiment'. In criminal prosecution relating to the violence, which resulted in deaths of some Roma, the local court had spoken of 'the marginal lifestyle' of certain Roma, or their 'rejection of the moral values accepted by the rest of the population', and of a propensity to crime.⁵¹³ In the European Court, the applicants argued that 'remarks made by the Târgu-Mureş County Court in its judgment of 17 July 1998, although made in the course of the criminal proceedings after the severance of the civil and criminal cases, could have had consequences for the outcome of the civil case, having regard to the close relation in Romanian law between the criminal proceedings and the civil claims'.⁵¹⁴ They noted that the civil court, in dismissing their claims, characterized them as 'liars and tax evaders'.⁵¹⁵

Concluding that article 14 had been breached, in conjunction with article 6, the Court noted that:

the applicants' Roma ethnicity appears to have been decisive for the length and the result of the domestic proceedings, after the entry into force of the Convention in respect of Romania. It further notes the repeated discriminatory remarks made by the authorities throughout the whole case determining the applicants' rights under Article 8, when rejecting claims for goods or furnishings, and their blank refusal until 2004 to award non-pecuniary damages for the destruction of the family homes. As to the judgment of 24 February 2004, confirmed by the Court of Cassation on 25 February 2005, the decision to reduce the non-pecuniary damages granted was motivated by remarks related directly to the applicants' ethnic specificity.⁵¹⁶

In a subsequent case dealing with the same episode of racist violence, the Court confirmed its finding of discrimination based upon ethnicity in the relevant judicial proceedings.⁵¹⁷

In sentencing a Roma defendant for fraud, a Romanian court spoke of a 'sentiment d'impunité, surtout parmi les membres des groupes minoritaires', explaining that this argued against imposing a suspended sentence.⁵¹⁸ The European Court refused to speculate on the outcome of the proceedings had these remarks not been made, or even the extent to which they might have influenced the Romanian judges, but it had no difficulty concluding that equal treatment had been denied the applicant.⁵¹⁹

Violations of article 14 in conjunction with article 6 have been found in cases dealing with access to a court. In a Spanish case, the Court concluded that article 14 had been violated, on the basis of sex, in conjunction with article 6, because of the failure to provide access to a court in order to establish discrimination in the workplace.⁵²⁰ Greek Catholics in Romania successfully challenged a situation where they were unable to obtain access to a court in order to establish their right to access religious facilities.⁵²¹

A refusal of legal aid to a person without legal status in Belgium for a case contesting paternity on the grounds that the legislation only permitted non-residents to have legal aid if there was a reciprocal agreement with their State of nationality was deemed discriminatory. The European Court noted the importance of the case ('des questions graves liées au droit de la famille') for the private and family life of the applicant, explaining that there would have to be 'des raisons particulièrement impérieuses pour justifier une différence de traitement entre la requérante, qui ne possédait pas de carte de séjour, et les personnes qui en possédaient une'.⁵²²

In a case dealing with contestation of paternity by the presumed father of a child, the Court held that article 6 had been breached because the applicant was denied access to a court after the expiry of certain time limits that did not apply to other 'interested parties'.⁵²³ Where an insurance tribunal charged with ruling upon eligibility for benefit referred to 'an "assumption based on experience of everyday life", namely that many married women give up their jobs when their first child is born and resume it only later', the Court concluded that there was a violation of article 6 in conjunction with article 14. '[T]he equality of the sexes is today a major goal in the member States of the Council of Europe and very weighty reasons would have to be put forward before such a difference of treatment could be regarded as compatible with the Convention', it said.⁵²⁴

Many legal systems provide for different procedural regimes and different jurisdictions, depending upon the infraction. The Court has rejected challenges claiming that this constitutes discrimination contrary to article 14.⁵²⁵ In an early decision, the European Commission held that differential treatment of elected officials in criminal proceedings could not be considered contrary to article 14.⁵²⁶

Reservations and declarations

The requirement of a public hearing has prompted several reservations. Austria's reservation concerning constitutional provisions on public hearings⁵²⁷ was applied by the Court in a number of cases.⁵²⁸ Eventually, the Court held that the reservation was invalid, noting that the conformity of the reservation with article 57 had never been properly examined.⁵²⁹ The Austrian reservation referred to a permissive, non-exhaustive provision of the constitution and lacked the statement of the relevant law to which it was to apply, as required by article 57(2). A reservation by Liechtenstein, subsequently modified nine years after ratification,⁵³⁰ to both the public hearing and public pronouncement of the judgment, with precise references to the applicable legislation, has been declared compatible with the Convention.⁵³¹ Both Croatia⁵³² and Serbia and Montenegro⁵³³ have made a reservation concerning the right to a public hearing before the Administrative Court. Estonia formulated a reservation concerning public hearings at the appellate court level.⁵³⁴

Serbia and Montenegro made a reservation to article 6, declaring that it was subject to its legislation governing minor offences, although the statement did not make it clear what the precise problem was. The declaration stated that the reservation would be withdrawn as soon as the legislation was amended.⁵³⁵ In 2011, Serbia withdrew this reservation.⁵³⁶

Reservations have also been made concerning the right to an oral hearing. Finland's reservation on the lack of an oral hearing in certain proceedings,⁵³⁷ part of which has since been withdrawn,⁵³⁸ was considered by the Court⁵³⁹ and subsequently declared valid.⁵⁴⁰ Switzerland's reservation concerning the right to a hearing⁵⁴¹ was declared invalid for failing to include a 'brief statement of the law', as required by article 57.⁵⁴² Switzerland withdrew the reservation in 2000.⁵⁴³

At the time of ratification, Ireland formulated a reservation to article 6(3)(c) stating that it did not interpret the text 'as requiring the provision of free legal assistance to any wider extent than is now provided in Ireland'.⁵⁴⁴ The Netherlands also made a reservation to article 6(3)(c), but applicable only to Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles.⁵⁴⁵ It later withdrew the reservation with respect to the Netherlands Antilles.⁵⁴⁶ Switzerland made an interpretative declaration stating that it considers the guarantee of free legal assistance, as well as that of an interpreter set out in paragraph 3(e), 'as not permanently absolving the beneficiary from payment of the resulting costs'.⁵⁴⁷

Hungary's reservation respecting the right to access to administrative courts⁵⁴⁸ was declared valid in a decision of the European Commission of Human Rights.⁵⁴⁹ It was withdrawn in 2000.⁵⁵⁰

Several States have formulated general reservations to article 6 respecting military discipline: Azerbaijan, Czech Republic,⁵⁵¹ France,⁵⁵² Slovakia,⁵⁵³ and Spain.⁵⁵⁴ Ireland made a reservation confined to article 6(3)(c) to the effect that it does not require the provision of free legal assistance 'wider extent than is now provided in Ireland'. legislation restricting the employment of non-nationals.⁵⁵⁵ A reservation made by Serbia and Montenegro excludes legislation governing prosecution of minor offences before magistrates' courts from the application of the Convention. Serbia later withdrew the reservation, although presumably it continues to apply to Montenegro.

Ukraine made the following reservation: 'Ukraine fully recognises on its territory the validity of Article 6, paragraph 3.d, of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 1950 in regard to the defendant's right to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses (Articles 263 and 303 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine) and as regards the rights of the suspect and persons charged in pre-trial proceedings to submit petitions for the attendance and examination of witnesses and the confrontation with them in accordance with Articles 43, 43¹ and 142 of the above-mentioned Code.'⁵⁵⁶ The purpose of this reservation is not very clear. The provisions of the Code that accompany it set out several procedural rights of the suspect.⁵⁵⁷

Malta made a declaration to article 6(2) to the effect that the presumption of innocence does not 'preclude any particular law from imposing upon any person charged under such law the burden of proving particular facts'.⁵⁵⁸

At the time of ratification, in 1974, Switzerland made a declaration with respect to article 6(1), stating that the guarantee of a fair trial 'is intended solely to ensure ultimate control by the judiciary over the acts or decisions of the public authorities relating to such rights or obligations or the determination of such a charge'.⁵⁵⁹ Switzerland's intention was apparently to address the consequences of the European Court's decision in Ringeisen v. Austria.⁵⁶⁰ In Belilos v. Switzerland, the Court held that Switzerland's 'interpretative declaration' was, in effect, a reservation. It then concluded that it was inconsistent with the requirements of article 57, and consequently invalid.⁵⁶¹ Switzerland then submitted what it called a 'clarification of the interpretative declaration': 'The Swiss Federal Council considers that the guarantee of fair trial in Article 6, paragraph 1 of the Convention in the determination of civil rights and obligations is intended solely to ensure ultimate control by the judiciary over the acts or decisions of the public authorities relating to such rights or obligations. For the purpose of the present declaration, "ultimate control by the judiciary" shall mean a control by the judiciary limited to the application of the law, such as a cassation control.'⁵⁶² Several months later, Switzerland submitted a compilation of federal and cantonal legislation that it said was covered by the revised declaration, although it said the 'continuing uncertainty' created by the case law meant that the list could not be taken to be exhaustive.⁵⁶³

Article 7. No punishment without law/Pas de peine sans loi

1. No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.

2. This article shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations.

1. Nul ne peut être condamné pour une action ou une omission qui, au moment où elle a été commise, ne constituait pas une infraction d'après le droit national ou international. De même il n'est infligé aucune peine plus forte que celle qui était applicable au moment où l'infraction a été commise.

Introductory comments

The direct ancestor of article 7 of the European Convention is article 11(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: 'No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.' The principle is consecrated in a familiar Latin expression: nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege. As one of a handful of rights that are not subject to derogation under the Convention and the relevant clauses of the other main human rights treaties, it is sometimes spoken of as being part of the noyau dur of human rights law. Often called the principle of legality, it was described recently by the Appeals Chamber of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon as a peremptory norm (jus cogens).¹

That there can be no punishment without law is a principle recognized long before it was codified in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the European Convention. It was set out in article 8 of the French Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen, adopted on 26 August 1789: 'no one shall suffer punishment except it be legally inflicted in virtue of a law passed and promulgated before the commission of the offense'. In international law, it may have first arisen at the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. Delegates from the United States objected to plans to prosecute violations of the 'laws and principles of humanity' that were too uncertain to have any place in a court of criminal justice.² They said they 'were of the opinion that an act could not be a crime in the legal sense of the word, unless it were made so by law, and that the commission of an act declared to be a crime by law could not be punished unless the law prescribed the penalty to be inflicted'.³ Despite their objections, the Treaty of Versailles proposed a trial of the German Emperor for breaches of 'a supreme offence against international morality and the sanctity of treaties', but the Netherlands, where he had sought refuge, refused to extradite for the reason that this would violate the maxim nullum crimen sine lege.

The principle of legality was discussed in a 1935 precedent of the Permanent Court of International Justice condemning Nazi decrees in Danzig that allowed courts to punish new crimes where they were 'deserving of penalty according to the fundamental conceptions of a penal law and sound popular feeling'. The Permanent Court said this was incompatible with the prohibition on retroactive punishment in the Constitution of the Free City, which was guaranteed by the League of Nations. The Nazi lawyer arguing before the Permanent Court contended that under the new legislation, 'real justice will take the place of formal justice, and that henceforth the rule will be nullum crimen sine poena instead of nullum crimen sine lege'.⁴

The Nazis themselves invoked the principle of legality when they were tried before the International Military Tribunal. Their lawyers filed a motion challenging the indictment because the charge of crimes against peace, which had never before been codified, was 'repugnant to a principle of jurisprudence sacred to the civilised world, the partial violation of which by Hitler's Germany has been vehemently discountenanced outside and inside the Reich'. They noted that the maxim nullum crimen sine lege 'is precisely not a rule of expediency but it derives from the recognition of the fact that any defendant must needs [sic] consider himself unjustly treated if he is punished under an ex post facto law'.⁵ The final judgment dismissed their objection, stating that 'it is to be observed that the maxim nullum crimen sine lege is not a limitation of sovereignty, but is in general a principle of justice'. The French version of the judgment is more qualified: '[n]ullum crimen sine lege ne limite pas la souveraineté des États; elle ne formule qu'une règle généralement suivie'. The judgment continues:

To assert that it is unjust to punish those who in defiance of treaties and assurances have attacked neighbouring states without warning is obviously untrue, for in such circumstances the attacker must know that he is doing wrong, and so far from it being unjust to punish him, it would be unjust if his wrong were allowed to go unpunished. . . [The Nazi leaders] must have known that they were acting in defiance of all international law when in complete deliberation they carried out their designs of invasion and aggression.⁶

In other words, the Tribunal admitted that there was a retroactive dimension to prosecution for crimes against peace, but said leaving such wrongs unpunished would be unjust. Commenting on the issue, Hens Kelsen argued that 'the retroactivity of the law applied to them can hardly be considered as absolutely incompatible with justice'. He said that justice required that the Nazi leaders be brought to book: 'to punish those who were morally responsible for the international crime of the Second World War may certainly be considered as more important than to comply with the rather relative rule against ex post facto laws, open to so many exceptions'.⁷

The Documented Outline prepared by the Secretariat of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in June 1947 as part of the drafting process of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights identified thirty-five national constitutions containing provisions formulating the non-retroactivity norm in one form or another, including six of the ten founding members of the Council of Europe: Belgium, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, and Sweden.⁸ In the United Kingdom, with no written constitution, it was an interpretative presumption. The principle was also present in the constitutions of Ireland and Italy, but these countries were not listed in the United Nations Outline because they were not yet Member States.

It would seem that what was a rather flexible approach to the nullum crimen principle at the time of the post-Second-World-War prosecutions has hardened into a more rigid and uncompromising prohibition. Yet the case law of the European Court of Human Rights pursuant to article 7 of the Convention in many ways reflects the spirit of the Nuremberg judges. Insisting that the crime be 'accessible' and 'foreseeable' to the accused person at the time of the punishable act, the Court has upheld prosecutions based upon unwritten norms, in particular when they concern serious crimes that violate human dignity.⁹

The equivalent provision in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights clearly reflects the text of article 7 of the European Convention. However, there is one addition, the recognition of the right to the lesser penalty if the law has been changed since the commission of the alleged act (lex mitior).¹⁰ The European Charter of Fundamental Rights relies upon the text of the Covenant but also makes an addition, setting out the principle of proportionate sentencing in paragraph 3:

Article 49. Principles of legality and proportionality of criminal offences and penalties

1. No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national law or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than that which was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed. If, subsequent to the commission of a criminal offence, the law provides for a lighter penalty, that penalty shall be applicable.
2. This Article shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles recognised by the community of nations.
3. The severity of penalties must not be disproportionate to the criminal offence.

According to the drafters of the European Charter, paragraph 1 of article 49 (with the exception of the last sentence), and paragraph 2 are meant to have the same meaning and scope as article 7 of the European Convention.¹¹

Drafting of the provision

The initial draft European Convention on Human Rights was prepared by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement, chaired by Pierre-Henri Teitgen, with David Maxwell Fyfe and Fernand Dehousse as rapporteurs. Both Maxwell Fyfe and Dehousse had been involved in the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights at the United Nations the previous year. Asked to prepare a text for discussion in the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions at the first session of the Consultative Assembly, held from 22 August to 5 September 1949, Teitgen proposed the following: 'Immunity from arbitrary arrest, detention and exile, in accordance with Articles 9, 10 and 11 of the United Nations Declaration'.¹² The annex contained the relevant provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, including article 11(2), where the nullum crimen principle is set out. The draft report submitted by Teitgen contained the following: 'Immunity from all arbitrary arrest, detention, exile and other arbitrary measures, in accordance with Articles 9, 10 and 11 of the Declaration of the United Nations'.¹³ With some small changes, this was the text adopted by the Consultative Assembly and forwarded to the Committee of Ministers.¹⁴

Meeting in November 1950, the Committee of Ministers decided to refer the draft to a Committee of Experts, with instructions that it should pay 'due attention' to the draft Covenant that had been adopted by the United Nations Commission of Human Rights in June 1949.¹⁵ On the nullum crimen issue, the Commission draft was identical to that of article 11(2) of the Declaration.¹⁶ Prior to the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the United Kingdom circulated its critical comments on the United Nations draft: 'His Majesty's Government consider that the latest text of this Article might be thought to impugn the validity of the judgments of the Nuremberg Tribunal. They therefore suggest that the Commission might wish to consider the desirability of adding a second paragraph to this Article on the following lines: "Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations."¹⁷ In fact, the additional paragraph proposed by the United Kingdom had been present in an earlier version of the draft Covenant¹⁸ and was removed at the 1949 session on the proposal of France.¹⁹

In preparation for the Committee of Experts meeting, Luxembourg raised a similar concern to that of the United Kingdom. Noting that article 11(2) of the Universal Declaration appeared 'absolutely to exclude the retrospective application of penal laws, whether they are laws defining crimes or laws governing punishment', Luxembourg said that '[c]onceived in this way, the prohibition appears to be too absolute'. It noted that the principle had been 'rejected' in legislation adopted subsequent to the Second World War. Luxembourg suggested that the absolute formulation of the Universal Declaration be 'attenuated' by the addition of a 'more subtle phraseology' and proposed this text: 'No one shall be guilty of any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, did not constitute a delinquent act, either under national or international law, nor according to the general principles of law as recognised by civilised nations.'²⁰

Sweden also had a proposal: 'As regards reference to Article 11, para. 2 of the United Nations Declaration, it is pointed out that each Member State reserves the right to apply to a crime or to an act or delinquent omission only that law which is in force in its territory at the time the act was committed.'²¹ The amendment was subsequently withdrawn, Sweden being satisfied with a statement in the Report of the Committee of Experts 'that the Convention does not compel Member States to apply, as a criminal measure, a rule of international law which is not incorporated in the national law'.²²

At the conclusion of its first session, in February 1950, the Committee of Experts adopted the text found in article 11(2) of the Universal Declaration.²³ The report of the Committee explains that instead of enumerating rights by reference to the relevant provision in the Universal Declaration, as had been done by the Consultative Assembly, it was better to incorporate the text verbatim. Accordingly, the Committee 'scrupulously adhered to the text of the Universal Declaration'.²⁴ At the second session of the Committee of Experts, in March 1950, the United Kingdom representative renewed efforts to add a second paragraph, submitting a text similar to what it had proposed to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights except that the words 'for any act or omission which' replaced 'for the commission of any act which'.²⁵ The United Kingdom provision was left unchanged by a Drafting Committee designated to review the text.²⁶ Shortly thereafter, the United Kingdom also prevailed with the same amendment in the drafting of the United Nations Covenant at the Sixth Session of the Commission on Human Rights. In that forum, several States considered that the issue of crimes under international law had already been addressed with the addition of the words 'international law' to the first sentence, in accordance with the Universal Declaration text, and thought the United Kingdom addition to be unnecessary. The United Kingdom replied that paragraph 2 would cover acts implicitly recognized by international law, even if they were not expressly addressed. Its proposal was accepted in the Commission on Human Rights by a vote of seven to six, with two abstentions.²⁷

The Committee of Experts of the Council of Europe concluded its work with the submission to the Committee of Ministers of two different drafts. The first, 'Alternatives A and A/2', was text adopted by the Committee of Experts at its first session.²⁸ The second, labelled 'Alternatives B and B/2', contained the text that had been proposed by the United Kingdom.²⁹ Referring to the principle of non-retroactivity, the Report of the Committee of Experts to the Committee of Ministers 'stressed' that what was being proposed 'did not affect the laws which, under the very exceptional circumstances at the end of the second world war, were passed in order to suppress war crimes, treason and collaboration with the enemy, and did not aim at any legal or moral condemnation of these laws'.³⁰ The wording had been sharpened somewhat by comparison with the draft report, which read: '... did not affect laws passed at the end of the world war to suppress war-crimes, treason and collaboration with the enemy, and did not imply any legal or moral condemnation of these laws'.³¹

The Conference of Senior Officials that convened in June 1950 assigned a Drafting Committee to attempt to reconcile the competing versions. It prepared a new formulation that essentially merged the two proposals.

- 1) No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.
- 2) Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations.³²

²⁷ UN Doc. E/CN.4/SR.159. The Report of the Commission on Human Rights provides the following explanation for the second paragraph: 'It was argued that the second paragraph of the article was superfluous: if, as was claimed, it was intended as a confirmation of the principles applied by the war crimes tribunals after the Second World War, it might have the opposite effect of calling into question the validity of the judgments of those tribunals; if it was intended as a guarantee that no alleged war criminal in the future would be able to argue that there were no positive principles of international law or of relevant national law qualifying his acts as crimes, it merely reiterated what was already contained in the expression "international law" in the first paragraph, since that term included "the generally recognised principles of law" mentioned at the end of the second paragraph. On the other hand, the view was heard that the saving provision set forth in paragraph 2 had no application to past convictions for war crimes, nor was it fully covered by the term "international law" contained in the first paragraph.' A change in wording from 'penal offence' to 'criminal offence' does not seem to have been intended to modify the meaning. In the French version, the original British proposal referred to 'des actions ou omissions'³³ and this became, in the Drafting Committee text, 'une action ou omission'.³⁴ The remaining reference to 'penal offence' in paragraph 1 was subsequently changed to 'criminal offence' in the final version adopted by the Conference.³⁵

At its fifth meeting in early August 1950, the Committee of Ministers removed the word 'when' from the first sentence of paragraph 1. Paragraph 2 was altered slightly by the Committee of Ministers, replacing the words 'Nothing in this article' with 'This article shall not'.³⁶ There were no further modifications of the text, and the version confirmed at the fifth session of the Committee of Ministers is the definitive one.

The heading 'No punishment without law' was added according to the provisions of Protocol No. 11.³⁷

Analysis and interpretation

Article 7 of the European Convention on Human Rights sets out, 'in general terms, the principle that only the law can define a crime and prescribe a penalty (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege) and prohibits in particular the retrospective application of the criminal law where it is to an accused's disadvantage'.³⁸ It is known as the 'principle of legality' in national law as well as in some international instruments,³⁹ such as the European Charter of Fundamental Rights, but the term is not generally used in the case law of the European Court of Human Rights.⁴⁰ The Court has insisted that 'the Convention is not confined to prohibiting the retrospective application of the criminal law to an accused's disadvantage'. Article 7 of the Convention also embodies, more generally, 'the principle that only the law can define a crime and prescribe a penalty (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege) and the principle that the criminal law must not be extensively construed to an accused's detriment, for instance by analogy; it follows from this that an offence must be clearly defined in law'.⁴¹

The guarantee enshrined in article 7 is 'an essential element of the rule of law',⁴² a notion also set out in recital 5 of the Preamble of the Convention. The provision requires a sufficiently elevated degree of legal precision so that the possibility of commission of an offence is 'foreseeable'. The criminal law must also be 'accessible'. In an example of extending definitions of crimes by analogy, two Romanian bank employees were prosecuted for passive corruption pursuant to legislation that referred only to 'civil servants' and 'other employees'. They argued that the law did not contemplate persons like themselves who worked in the private sector, and the Court agreed. It indicated that it would have been acceptable to apply a provision broadly in this manner but only if previous case law provided support, which it did not.⁴³ Article 7 also appears to confirm the principle of strict interpretation of criminal law.⁴⁴ Furthermore, '[i]t should be construed and applied, as follows from its object and purpose, in such a way as to provide effective safeguards against arbitrary prosecution, conviction and punishment'.⁴⁵ The 'prominent place' of article 7 in the Convention is 'underlined' by the fact that no derogation is permitted under article 15 in time of war or other public emergency.⁴⁶

The text of article 7(1) makes it very clear that this provision only applies to criminal proceedings. There is no prohibition of retroactive, or retrospective, legislation outside of the prescription of crimes and punishments. Indeed, the Court has repeatedly ruled that in civil disputes 'in principle, the legislature is not prevented from regulating, through new retrospective provisions, rights derived from the laws in force'.⁴⁷ Retroactive provisions may even apply to criminal procedure where, to the extent they do not impact upon the definitions of criminal conduct and the available penalties, they do not appear to be prohibited by article 7. Nor is retroactive or retrospective application of the law prohibited when this is to the advantage of an accused or convicted person.⁴⁸ However, 'the principle of the rule of law and the notion of fair trial enshrined in Article 6 preclude, except for compelling public-interest reasons, interference by the legislature with the administration of justice designed to influence the judicial determination of a dispute'.⁴⁹ More generally, legal certainty has been identified as a fundamental component of the rule of law, and something necessary to encourage the trust of litigants in the justice system as a whole.⁵⁰ Thus, retrospective or retroactive legislation outside the criminal sphere requires close scrutiny.

The first sentence of the first paragraph of article 7 sets out the principle of non-retroactivity of crimes, referring to both national and international law. The second sentence of the paragraph states a variant on the rule against retroactive punishment by prohibiting the imposition of a penalty that is heavier than what was applicable at the time of the commission of the offence. The second paragraph of article 7 establishes a special rule intended to shelter from challenge under the Convention a prosecution based upon acts that were 'criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations'.

Problems arise in the case of a 'continuing crime', where some acts are perpetrated before the entry into force of the crime and some after. To the extent that the applicant is convicted without distinction as to the acts prior to and subsequent to the relevant legislation, there is a violation of article 7(1), because of concern that the earlier conduct influenced the severity of the penalty or had other tangible negative consequences.⁵¹

Article 17, preventing the Convention being interpreted as implying a right to engage in activity aimed at the destruction of fundamental rights, cannot be used to prevent a physical person from invoking the provisions of article 7.⁵²

'Law'

The term 'law' in article 7 is used in the same sense as when it appears elsewhere in the Convention, for example in articles 2, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, and 11. Interpreting the phrase 'prescribed by law' that is used in article 10(2), the Court said that a norm could not be regarded as 'law' unless it was 'formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct'.⁵³ The Court said this did not mean the consequences had to be foreseeable with 'absolute certainty', deeming this unattainable. It acknowledged that law should not be excessively rigid so as to permit it 'to keep pace with changing circumstances'.⁵⁴ These general principles have informed the understanding of 'law' as the term is used in article 7, but with probably greater rigour given that criminal law is the focus of the provision and the consequences for the individual often involve deprivation of freedom.

There are important 'qualitative requirements', principally accessibility and foreseeability.⁵⁵ The European Court found that retrospective imposition of a heavier penalty relating to release after service of part of a life sentence was a question of 'quality of law'. The relevant legislation in Cyprus 'taken as a whole was not formulated with sufficient precision as to enable the applicant to discern, even with appropriate advice, to a degree that was reasonable in the circumstances, the scope of the penalty of life imprisonment and the manner of its execution'.⁵⁶

Although rarely invoked by the European Court, the content of the law is also relevant to the concept of 'law'. In a case dealing with a sham trial of political opponents held in Czechoslovakia in 1950, the European Court said 'the practice of eliminating opponents to a political regime through the death penalty, imposed at the end of trials which flagrantly infringed the right to a fair trial and, in particular, the right to life, can not be described as "law" within the meaning of Article 7 of the Convention'.⁵⁷

Certainly 'law' as the word is used in article 7 must be appreciated in its substantive rather than its formal sense.⁵⁸ It is construed to refer to law in many different forms, including both written and unwritten law, and to both positive legislative enactments and to case law.⁵⁹ It has thus included enactments of lower rank than statutes as well as unwritten law that has emerged through judicial pronouncement.⁶⁰ In two celebrated cases, the Court examined the crime of rape under the legal system of England and Wales, where there is no formal codification and where judges apply an offense defined as part of the common law, that is to say, as elucidated in prior judicial decisions. The Court explained that '[i]n a common law system, not only written statutes but also rules of common or other customary law may provide sufficient legal basis for the criminal convictions envisaged in Article 7'.⁶¹ It said that where criminal law was developed in such a way, the law-making function of the Courts 'must remain within reasonable limits'.⁶² A judicial evolution by which rape could be perpetrated by a man against his wife, something previously excluded by the common law, was upheld as acceptable by the Court.

As a general principle, the European Court of Human Rights does not intrude in the interpretation of national laws given by the relevant domestic courts, unless there is 'flagrant non-observance or arbitrariness' in their application.⁶³ Nor does it have any authority to determine whether the person in question is criminally liable, something that is reserved exclusively for the national courts.⁶⁴ Such deference does not apply in the same way when article 7 is concerned. However, in applying article 7, the European Court will review the interpretation of criminal law provisions that has been conducted by the national courts.⁶⁵ According to an early decision of the Commission: 'Although it is not normally for the Commission to ascertain the proper interpretation of municipal law by national courts, the case is otherwise in matters where the Convention expressly refers to municipal law, as it does in Article 7'.⁶⁶ The power of review in such cases must be greater than normal because it is the law itself, and its application by national courts, that is the essence of the right in question. According to the Grand Chamber, 'Article 7 § 1 requires the Court to examine whether there was a contemporaneous legal basis for the applicant's conviction and, in particular, it must satisfy itself that the result reached by the relevant domestic courts... was compatible with Article 7 of the Convention, even if there were differences between the legal approach and reasoning of this Court and the relevant domestic decisions. To accord a lesser power of review to this Court would render Article 7 devoid of purpose.'⁶⁷

Sometimes, laws confer discretion on officials who are then responsible for their application, and to that extent the actual scope of the law may not be entirely foreseeable. According to the Court, such laws are not inconsistent with article 7 'provided that the scope of the discretion and the manner of its exercise are indicated with sufficient clarity, having regard to the legitimate aim in question, to give the individual adequate protection against arbitrary interference'.⁶⁸

The requirement of 'law' imposes upon the Court the duty to verify that there was in fact a legal provision making an act punishable, and that the penalty imposed did not exceed what was fixed by that provision.⁶⁹ In a case involving trespass regulations in Greenland where protesters at the American base were prosecuted, the Court considered that a provision of the Penal Code authorizing enactment of delegated legislation 'in accordance with established practice' was sufficient to meet the requirement of a sufficient legal basis. The provision provided legal authority to a range of administrative rules adopted by the Provincial Council of Greenland.⁷⁰

Role of judicial interpretation and case law

In a simplistic sense, any new interpretation by courts of existing law has the potential to violate the rule against retroactive application. Such a rigid approach would deny the courts any contribution in the progressive development of the law. In any case, regardless of how clear a legal text may seem, there is always an element of legal interpretation involved in understanding the scope of an enactment.⁷¹ Moreover, as the Court has often noted, 'the wording of statutes is not always precise'.⁷² Legislators frequently regulate conduct by general categorizations rather than through exhaustive codification, with the consequence that 'many laws are inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent are, and their interpretation and application depend on practice'.⁷³ This makes judicial interpretation an indispensable part of the process of making law foreseeable and accessible.

The Convention organs have repeatedly stated that 'it is a firmly established part of the legal tradition of the States party to the Convention that case-law, as one of the sources of the law, necessarily contributes to the gradual development of the criminal law'.⁷⁴ Moreover, it actually contributes to greater legal certainty, which is obviously one of the central values underpinning article 7. In effect, '[t]he role of adjudication vested in the courts is precisely to dissipate such interpretational doubts as remain'.⁷⁵ Indeed, the lack of accessible and reasonably foreseeable judicial interpretation may actually result in a breach of article 7.⁷⁶ The Grand Chamber has explained that:

in any system of law, however clearly drafted a legal provision may be, including a criminal law provision, there is an inevitable element of judicial interpretation. There will always be a need for elucidation of doubtful points and for adaptation to changing circumstances. Again, whilst certainty is highly desirable, it may bring in its train excessive rigidity and the law must be able to keep pace with changing circumstances.⁷⁷

Article 7 does not inhibit the 'gradual clarification of the rules of criminal liability through judicial interpretation from case to case', although the development that results must be 'consistent with the essence of the offence' and be reasonably foreseeable.⁷⁸ The Grand Chamber has distinguished 'an interpretation of criminal law pursuing a perceptible line of case-law development' that it identified in the spousal rape cases from the United Kingdom, discussed earlier, and a new and unexpected turn in Spanish case law respecting remission of sentence.⁷⁹ In the latter case, the Grand Chamber considered that 'at the time when the applicant was convicted and at the time when she was notified of the decision to combine her sentences and set a maximum term of imprisonment, there was no indication of any perceptible line of case-law development' by which the effective length of the sentence would be increased.⁸⁰ An absence of case law with respect to a given crime may be a factor favouring the applicant in an article 7 case.⁸¹

Administrative practice in the implementation of law, and in particular sentencing provisions, may create a 'legitimate expectation'.⁸² But a tolerance or a practice by which legal provisions may not have been applied in a thorough manner cannot justify a claim that article 7 has been violated. Even if criminal law provisions have not been applied for many years, they remain in force and can be activated by a change in prosecutorial policy and even, where laws permit this, at the initiative of an individual complainant.⁸³ The relationship between policy and law is especially acute in the case of offences such as assault, where general principles seem to give way to customs and traditions that are highly influenced by culture. Starting with a broad prohibition by which the application of force to another person that causes bodily harm is prohibited by law, there is a multitude of exceptions and special understandings that govern the relationship between the criminal law and practices such as consensual fighting, duelling, violent sports like boxing and wrestling, tattooing and other forms of body mutilation, ritual disfiguring of the sexual organs, and cosmetic surgery. In a Belgian case, the applicants did not challenge the legal text itself, which was a rather classic prohibition of assault, but claimed instead that there was a tolerance of such conduct in the 'liberal, permissive and individualistic society' of modern-day Belgium. To the argument that there was no relevant case law interpreting the provision as a prohibition on such behaviour, the Court said this was not significant because the practices themselves were both very violent and very rare.⁸⁴

Foreseeability and accessibility

The Convention organs have employed the words 'foreseeability' and 'accessibility' to describe the requirements of law imposed by article 7 of the Convention. The scope of these concepts 'depends to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument in issue, the field it is designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it is addressed'.⁸⁵ The European Court concluded that legislation was not 'foreseeable' where a crime established by Maltese law could be punished before two different courts, at the discretion of the prosecutor, with the consequence that two different sentencing scales applied. In deciding where to try the case, the Court agreed that the prosecutor might have given weight to a number of criteria, but these were not specified in a legislative text, nor were they clarified through case law over the years. Consequently, the decision was 'inevitably subjective and left room for arbitrariness, particularly given the lack of procedural safeguards'.⁸⁶

According to the Convention organs, law may still satisfy the requirement of foreseeability 'where the person concerned has to take appropriate legal advice to assess, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail'.⁸⁷ On occasion, the Court has noted the impossibility, even with the help of professional legal advice, of foreseeing a change in judicial interpretation of criminal law provisions.⁸⁸ In Groppera Radio AG, the relevant provisions of international telecommunications law were highly technical and complex, and intended for specialists. The Court said it was to be expected of a business engaging in broadcasting across a frontier that it would seek to inform itself fully about the applicable rules with the help of advisers.⁸⁹ In a Georgian prosecution for the crime of being a 'thief in law', that is today, 'a member of the thieves' underworld who, using any type of methods, directly runs or coordinates the running of the thieves' underworld', the European Court noted that this rather colloquial description of the crime was not only well-known to the general public in Georgia, it was apparently done 'to ensure that the essence of the newly criminalised offences would be grasped more easily by the general public'.⁹⁰

The case law speaks of crimes that are 'reasonably' foreseeable, implying that the assessment is an objective one. Nevertheless, the Court will sometimes consider the personal circumstances of the applicant when deciding whether a crime was foreseeable. There are higher expectations with respect to foreseeability and accessibility with respect to persons carrying on a professional activity, as they are used to proceeding with a high degree of caution with respect to legal norms. Thus, they should 'take special care in assessing the risks that such activity entails'.⁹¹ In a Belgian case, the Court noted that one of the applicants was a magistrate who could be expected to be familiar with relevant case law.⁹²

Although the case law is sparse on this point, as a general proposition it seems proper that the accessibility and foreseeability of criminal offences within the framework of an article 7 analysis must also take into account available defences, excuses, and justifications, and modes of liability. These matters are not strictly speaking components of the definitions of the offences, but they nevertheless can have a substantial impact on whether or not there is individual criminal liability. As a general rule, domestic courts refuse to entertain a defence of mistake or ignorance of the law (ignorantia juris non excusat), in effect making the individual face the consequences of a penal provision regardless of how accessible the law may have been.

In some of the cases concerning atrocity crimes the Court has had to consider the availability of the defence of superior orders. The defence of superior orders was simply prohibited by the Charter of the International Military Tribunal,⁹³ but it is probably fair to say that soldiers and other persons required to obey orders from superiors may avail of the defence to the extent that the order is not manifestly unlawful. This is the way the matter was formulated in early decisions⁹⁴ and it is also presented in this manner in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.⁹⁵ The Court has taken the view that 'even a private soldier could not show total, blind obedience to orders which flagrantly infringed not only the [German Democratic Republic's] own legal principles but also internationally recognised human rights, in particular the right to life'.⁹⁶ Despite being ordered to do so, it considered that a soldier was not justified in firing on unarmed persons who were merely trying to leave the country. In Kononov, the Court examined whether an order to murder civilians suspected of complicity in Nazi atrocities could furnish a defence to charges of war crimes. The Grand Chamber said that 'even the most cursory reflection by the applicant, would have indicated that, at the very least, the impugned acts risked being counter to the laws and customs of war as understood at that time and, notably, risked constituting war crimes for which, as commander, he could be held individually and criminally accountable'.⁹⁷ In another case concerning atrocities perpetrated during the wars in the former Yugoslavia, the Court said that 'having in mind the flagrantly unlawful nature of his acts, which included murders and torture of Bosniacs within the context of a widespread and systematic attack against the Bosniac civilian population of the Višegrad Municipality, even the most cursory reflection by the applicant would have indicated that they risked constituting a crime against humanity for which he could be held criminally accountable'.⁹⁸ It held that national legislation based upon the definition of crimes against humanity in the Rome Statute, which was adopted in 1998 and entered into force in 2002, can be applied to acts perpetrated in 1992 without offending article 7.⁹⁹ In another case dealing with atrocities perpetrated in Africa, the Court held that 'at the time when the offences were committed, the applicant's actions constituted offences that were defined with sufficient accessibility and foreseeability under French law and international law, and that the applicant could reasonably, if need be with the help of informed legal advice, have foreseen the risk of being prosecuted and convicted for acts of torture committed by him between 1990 and 1991'.¹⁰⁰

Statutory limitation

Where statutory limitation may apply to a particular offence, a question arises as to whether a change that would be to the detriment of an individual falls within the ambit of article 7(1). Statutory limitation is often involved in nullum crimen issues, especially when there has been a change of regime, as is the case in the countries of Eastern and Central Europe. According to the Court, 'it is legitimate for a State governed by the rule of law to bring criminal proceedings against persons who have committed crimes under a former regime'.¹⁰¹ The words of Judge Nicolas Bratza, albeit in a somewhat different context, seem relevant to the issue. Referring to prosecution of German border guards for murdering fugitives, he said that he accepted 'that the situation in the [German Democratic Republic] was such that the applicant could hardly have foreseen at the time that his actions would result in his prosecution for the offence of intentional homicide'. But, said

Judge Bratza, that is not at all the same question as 'whether the applicant could reasonably have foreseen that his actions amounted to such an offence'.¹⁰²

In Kononov, the Grand Chamber addressed the issue of statutory limitation indirectly, answering the applicant's argument that his prosecution was time-barred by concluding that there was no statutory limitation applicable to war crimes at the time the offence was committed.¹⁰³ The better view was expressed by four judges in a joint concurring opinion. They explained:

Article 7 of the Convention and the principles it enshrines require that in a rule-of-law system anyone considering carrying out a particular act should be able, by reference to the legal rules defining crimes and the corresponding penalties, to determine whether or not the act in question constitutes a crime and what penalty he or she faces if it is carried out. Hence no one can speak of retroactive application of substantive law, when a person is convicted, even belatedly, on the basis of rules existing at the time of the commission of the act. Considering, as the Court leaves one to believe, that the procedural issue of the statute of limitations is a constituent element of the applicability of Article 7, linked to the question of retroactive application and sitting alongside, with equal force, the conditions of the existence of a crime and a penalty, can lead to unwanted results which could undermine the very spirit of Article 7.¹⁰⁴

In effect, the entitlement of an accused person is to be prosecuted only with respect to crimes and punishments in existence at the time of the impugned act. This is not at all the same, however, as a right to benefit from changes to legal terms on statutory limitation. The Kononov case was a particularly difficult manifestation of the problem, because the applicant's argument was that war crimes were subject to statutory limitation when committed in 1944, while acknowledging this to have changed subsequently.

International law

Like article 11(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and article 15(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, article 7(1) of the Convention refers to criminal offences under 'international law' as well as under 'national law'. Given that the European Court exercises jurisdiction essentially over national proceedings pursuant to national law, issues arise when criminal offences under national law are prosecuted using retrospective or retroactive provisions but where the government insists that the crimes in question already existed under international law.

When the Convention was adopted, the notion of 'crimes under international law' was already fairly well developed. For example, in 1946 the United Nations General Assembly adopted a resolution affirming that 'genocide is a crime under international law' ('le génocide est un crime du droit des gens').¹⁰⁵ The Charter of the International Military Tribunal, a document that was widely ratified and whose principles were also confirmed by a General Assembly resolution,¹⁰⁶ codified three categories of international crime: war crimes, crimes against peace, and crimes against humanity. In addition to these offences, which concern atrocities and human rights violations, international law also recognizes a variety of offences many of which are also characterized as 'transnational', in the areas of piracy, terrorism, and drug trafficking.

The identification of the content of the offences under international law poses particular problems. Because of the increasing codification of international crimes, reference to written texts of international law may be sufficient, at least for crimes committed in the recent past. According to the Court, article 7 remains 'wholly valid where . . . an international instrument for the protection of human rights of universal scope has been enacted'.¹⁰⁷ In identifying 'universal scope', near-universal ratification, for example of the Geneva Conventions, may be relevant. Sometimes, crimes are punished as international offences but by national courts, despite the fact that they were not codified in a relevant international instrument at the time of the act. Reliance is placed upon the existence of the crime under customary international law in somewhat the same manner that some national courts recognized crimes of common law.

When the international crimes are codified, there can be disputes relating from differing definitions. There is, for example, rather significant variation in the definition of crimes against humanity in the various international texts, as well as in the reflections of these crimes when they are incorporated into national law. In Jorgić v. Germany, the Court noted that a broad concept of genocide was being applied by the national courts of Germany that was not consistent with the prevailing interpretation of the crime by international tribunals, notably the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and the International Court of Justice. Nevertheless, while many authorities had favoured a narrow interpretation of the crime of genocide, there had already been several authorities at the material time which had construed the offence of genocide in the same wider way as the German courts. In these circumstances, the Court finds that the applicant, if need be with the assistance of a lawyer, could reasonably have foreseen that he risked being charged with and convicted of genocide for the acts he had committed in 1992.¹⁰⁸

The Court noted, in this context, that Jorgić had been convicted of several killings, detention and ill-treatment as leader of a paramilitary group pursuing a policy of ethnic cleansing. Consequently, 'the national courts' interpretation of the crime of genocide could reasonably be regarded as consistent with the essence of that offence and could reasonably be foreseen by the applicant at the material time'.¹⁰⁹

The International Military Tribunal said that international criminal law was 'not static, but by continual adaptation follows the needs of a changing world'.¹¹⁰ Because of the evolution in the notion of international crimes, problems with respect to article 7(1) may arise because of the need to fix the relevant law at the time the crimes were committed and to determine, using the general notions applicable to that provision of the Convention, whether the international law was foreseeable and accessible. Examples have been presented with respect to prosecutions by courts of Eastern and Central Europe during the 1990s and 2000s of crimes committed half a century earlier in association with the Second World War and with the post-war regimes. Although crimes against humanity were recognized under international law at Nuremberg, they were severely restricted by the requirement of a nexus with international armed conflict and aggressive war. It is beyond debate that by the 1990s, this restriction on crimes against humanity had disappeared, and they could be prosecuted even when committed in peacetime. The European Court has dismissed complaints founded on article 7(1) with respect to prosecution for crimes against humanity in peacetime dating from the 1940s and 1950s.¹¹¹ However, as Antonio Cassese wrote in an article criticizing the case law of the European Court, 'the indispensable link between those crimes and war had not yet been severed' in the late 1940s. He said it was only later, in the late 1960s, that a general rule gradually began to evolve, prohibiting crimes against humanity even when committed in time of peace.¹¹² Similar issues arise with respect to war crimes. The Grand Chamber has acknowledged that 'in 1944 a nexus with an international armed conflict was required to prosecute acts as war crimes'.¹¹³ Obviously, that nexus is no longer mandatory because article 8 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court recognizes individual liability for war crimes perpetrated in non-international armed conflict. At what point between 1944 and 1998, when the Rome Statute was adopted, the nexus disappeared is a matter of debate in relevant cases.

In some cases, the legal provisions of national law are inspired by international law but reflect it in an inexpert and sometimes inaccurate manner. For example, Hungarian law refers to the notion of crimes against humanity set out in common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. Yet common article 3 does not purport to define criminal offences. The Court said that it was not its role 'to seek to establish authoritatively the meaning of the concept of "crime against humanity" as it stood in 1956'.¹¹⁴ The rather clumsy and idiosyncratic definition in the Hungarian law probably contributed to the finding of a violation by the Grand Chamber in an application submitted by a former police chief who had been convicted for a killing that took place during the 1956 revolution.¹¹⁵

Heavier penalty

The principle of legality concerns the penalty as well as the crime itself, as the second sentence of article 7(1) affirms: 'Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.' The relevant Latin maxim is nulla poena sine lege, although strictly speaking it affirms the requirement that the penalty be foreseeable and accessible to the perpetrator at the time the criminal act takes place. The 'qualitative requirements' of accessibility and foreseeability apply to the penalty as well as to the definition of the offence.¹¹⁶ The concept of penalty in article 7(1) is autonomous, like the notions of 'civil rights and obligations' and 'criminal charge' in article 6(1), in that the European Court is free to determine whether a particular measure is a penalty regardless of the qualification that it may be given under national law.¹¹⁷ The Court is free to go behind appearances and make its own assessment as to the substantive nature of a particular measure.¹¹⁸

The starting point in determining whether something is a penalty is whether it is imposed following conviction for a 'criminal offence'.¹¹⁹ The Court may also take other factors into account, such as the nature and purpose of the measure in question, the way it is characterized under national law, the relevant procedures, and the severity.¹²⁰ 'The severity of the measure is not, however, in itself decisive', the Court has said, because 'for instance, many non-penal measures of a preventive nature may have a substantial impact on the person concerned'.¹²¹ Considering the claim that listing of an individual on the Sex Offenders Register might lead to some public stigmatization, the European Commission said this could not be relevant to 'whether the Act imposes a "penalty" as they stem from the public's reaction to particular types of offence, rather than from the registration requirements'.¹²²

Although conviction for a criminal offence is a starting point for consideration of an issue of retroactive punishment, it does not follow that every legal consequence of the conviction amounts to punishment within the meaning of article 7(1). Legislation in the Netherlands imposed a requirement of DNA sampling on convicted criminals. According to the Court, the purpose of the measure in question is to assist in the solving of crimes, including bringing their perpetrators to justice, since, with the help of the database, the police may be able to identify perpetrators of offences faster, and to contribute towards a lower rate of reoffending, since a person knowing that his or her DNA profile is included in a national database may dissuade him or her from committing further offences. The Court considers that, seen in this light, the Act merely employs the applicant's conviction as a criterion by means of which he could be identified as a person who has shown himself capable of committing an offence of a certain severity, rather than that the measure in question is to be seen as intending to inflict a punishment upon him in relation to the particular offences of which he has been convicted.¹²³

Fines and similar measures pose particular problems. It is important to ascertain whether they are imposed essentially to inflict punishment and deter future breaches, or rather to provide pecuniary reparation for damages. If a fine appears to be both deterrent and punitive, the conclusion may well be that it is criminal in nature.¹²⁴ It is common for justice systems to provide for imprisonment in the case of failure to pay a fine, although the fact that a financial penalty cannot be converted into a prison sentence in case of default is not decisive in determining whether it is criminal in nature.¹²⁵ In Jamil v. France, legislation providing for imprisonment following default on payment of a customs fine was challenged under article 7(1). The Court noted that the regime was harsher than for sentences of imprisonment under ordinary criminal law because it was not mitigated by parole, pardon, and similar measures. 'Imprisonment in default is a survival of the ancient system of imprisonment for debt', said the judgment. '[I]t now exists only in respect of debts to the State and does not absolve the debtor from the obligation to pay which led to his committal to prison.' Noting that the sanction was ordered by a criminal court, was intended as a deterrent and could lead to deprivation of liberty, the Court concluded that the fine was indeed a penalty and subject to article 7(1).¹²⁶

In cases involving changes to provisions for parole eligibility that are to the detriment of a convicted person serving a sentence of imprisonment, there has been some fluctuation in the case law. A line of cases holds that this is not the modification of a 'penalty'.¹²⁷ According to the Grand Chamber, 'the manner of their implementation and the reasoning behind' early release or parole policies are matters for domestic criminal justice policy.¹²⁸ In the important case of Kafkaris v. Cyprus, a provision by which life imprisonment was the mandatory sentence for murder, but where release after twenty years had been served was possible, was modified subsequent to the crime with the effect that the convicted person would not be eligible for release. According to the Grand Chamber, such a measure concerning remission of a sentence or a change in a regime for early release was not part of the 'penalty' within the meaning of Article 7:

However, as regards the fact that as a consequence of the change in the prison law . . . the applicant, as a life prisoner, no longer has a right to have his sentence remitted, the Court notes that this matter relates to the execution of the sentence as opposed to the 'penalty' imposed on him, which remains that of life imprisonment. Although the changes in the prison legislation and in the conditions of release may have rendered the applicant's imprisonment effectively harsher, these changes cannot be construed as imposing a heavier 'penalty' than that imposed by the trial court . . .¹²⁹

In subsequent cases, the Court distinguished Kafkaris. For example, in one decision it viewed expulsion from territory as a substitute for a prison sentence then being served to be a 'penalty' within the meaning of article 7: '[L]e remplacement de la peine de prison de dix-huit mois infligée au requérant par son expulsion et l'interdiction de territoire pour une durée de dix ans, sans qu'il ait été entendu et sans qu'il ait été tenu compte des circonstances autres que l'application quasi automatique de la nouvelle rédaction de l'article 89 du code pénal en vigueur depuis le 1er octobre 2003, doit s'analyser en une peine au même titre que celle fixée lors de la condamnation de l'intéressé.'¹³⁰

In a German case, the extension of preventive detention was extended from ten years to an unlimited period of time. In Germany, preventive detention is not considered a penalty subject to the prohibition on retrospective punishment but rather a measure of correction and prevention.¹³¹ At the time of the offence, a preventive detention order could be made for a maximum of ten years. The law changed, with the consequence that applicant's preventive detention was prolonged with retrospective effect after six years in preventive detention had been served.¹³² In Kafkaris, it could not be assumed at the time sentence was imposed that it would actually amount to twenty years' imprisonment. By contrast, in the German case when the crime was committed the law 'clearly and unambiguously fixed the duration of a first period of preventive detention at a maximum of ten years'.¹³³

The Grand Chamber returned to this issue in Del Rio Prado v. Spain. It explained that the term 'imposed' in the second sentence of article 7(1) was not to be interpreted as excluding all measures introduced after the pronouncement of the sentence.¹³⁴ It said it would 'not rule out the possibility that measures taken by the legislature, the administrative authorities or the courts after the final sentence has been imposed or while the sentence is being served may result in the redefinition or modification of the scope of the "penalty" imposed by the trial court'.¹³⁵ Judges Mahoney and Vehabović did not see the distinction with the earlier case law of the Court and dissented, while acknowledging 'the humanitarian thinking behind the reasoning of the majority' and recognizing 'that the circumstances of the present case are quite extraordinary and, indeed, disquieting from the point of view of the fairness of treatment of prisoners, especially those who have the prospect of spending a large part of their life incarcerated'.¹³⁶

Placement of offenders on registers for sex offenders has also been the subject of applications to the Court. These are deemed to be 'public-order measures' rather than penalties. The French Sex Offenders Register 'is designed to prevent persons who have committed sexual offences or violent crimes from reoffending and to ensure that they can be identified and traced'.¹³⁷ Therefore, according to the Court, it has a preventive and deterrent purpose and cannot be considered punitive or as constituting a sanction.¹³⁸

When prisoners are moved from one jurisdiction to another pursuant to a transfer agreement such as the Council of Europe Transfer Convention and its Additional Protocol,¹³⁹ the new system may be harsher in some respects, leading to charges that a breach of article 7(1) may be involved. In several cases the Court has dismissed such claims on the grounds that changes should not be considered a penalty because they concern the execution of a sentence rather than a sentence itself.¹⁴⁰ As a more general proposition, the Court has insisted upon the distinction between a measure that is a penalty in a substantive sense, and to which article 7 clearly applies, and one that concerns its execution or enforcement.¹⁴¹ But it has also acknowledged that 'in practice, the distinction between the two may not always be clear-cut'.¹⁴² Of course, the sentence imposed following transfer may also be challenged as inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment under article 3, although 'where a measure of international cooperation is directed at promoting and protecting the fundamental rights of those subject to criminal sanctions abroad, the benefit enjoyed by the applicant as a result of the execution of that measure is an important factor in favour of finding that the manner and method of the execution of the sentence do not subject the applicant to distress or hardship exceeding the unavoidable level of suffering inherent in detention'.¹⁴³

The notion of 'heavier' penalty in article 7(1) may present difficulties when the nature of the penalty is changed. It may not be obvious that one type of penalty is more or less severe than another. In a Spanish case, the law allowed a judge, at his or her discretion, to replace a sentence of detention with expulsion from the territory and a prohibition of return for a period of time. New legislation made expulsion the rule, and allowed a custodial sentence only in exceptional circumstances. Moreover, the prohibition of return was for ten years rather than for three to ten years, constituting a penalty that was 'bien plus sévère que celle prévue par l'ancienne version de la même disposition du code pénal'.¹⁴⁴

In an Austrian case before the European Commission, the applicant had been sentenced to three years' imprisonment followed by detention in a labour camp. Subsequently, the courts converted the applicant's labour camp sentence into imprisonment in an institution for dangerous recidivists, because labour camps had been abolished in the meantime. The Commission referred to a previous case where it had held that it had not been substantiated that the character of the detention in an institution for recidivists was essentially different from the conditions in the former labour camps, and in particular that more restrictive conditions of confinement were imposed.¹⁴⁵ Decades later, the Court considered X. v. Austria, noting that it concerned two different types of penalty, namely a prison sentence and a labour camp, and even then the Commission did not consider the character of the penalty as 'essentially different'.¹⁴⁶

In countries where the death penalty has been abolished, it is invariably replaced with a lengthy term of imprisonment. In a Bulgarian case, the Court held that in replacing capital punishment with a sentence of life imprisonment, 'the amendment of the forms of penalties envisaged in the Criminal Code for the most severe offence for which the applicant was found guilty operated in the applicant's favour and he received a more lenient penalty than was envisaged for that offence at the time it was committed'.¹⁴⁷ The issue was considered in a case directed against Azerbaijan but without the Court making any firm pronouncement.¹⁴⁸ In Öcalan v. Turkey (no. 2), a Chamber held that the replacement of capital punishment with a sentence of life imprisonment where there was no possibility of release did not breach article 7.¹⁴⁹ Nevertheless, such an incompressible life sentence was in breach of article 3.¹⁵⁰

It is quite normal for criminal justice systems to provide more severe penalties in the case of recidivism. The Court has insisted that in 'matters relating to the existence of such rules [on recidivism], the manner of their implementation and the reasoning behind them fall within the power of the High Contracting Parties to determine their own criminal policy, which is not in principle a matter for [the Court] to comment on'.¹⁵¹ French law required that the second crime be committed within a statutory period for the consequences of recidivism to be considered in sentencing, in effect establishing a form of statutory limitation with respect to the aggravation of sentence.¹⁵² The Court noted that well-established principles had been recognized by the Court of Cassation with respect to the consequence of new legislation concerning recidivism, and this was 'manifestly capable of enabling the applicant to regulate his conduct'.¹⁵³

Lex mitior

In contrast with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the text of the European Convention does not set out the lex mitior principle. Article 15(1) of the Covenant ensures that '[i]f, subsequent to the commission of the offence, provision is made by law for the imposition of the lighter penalty, the offender shall benefit thereby'. A 1978 decision of the European Commission of Human Rights held that the right to a more lenient penalty was not implied within article 7 of the European Convention.¹⁵⁴ That ruling was then confirmed by the European Court on several occasions¹⁵⁵ until, in 2009, the Grand Chamber reversed the position and held that article 7 could sustain the right of an offender to application of a more favourable criminal law.¹⁵⁶ In Scoppola v. Italy (no. 2), the Grand Chamber noted that in addition to recognition in the International Covenant and the American Convention on Human Rights, the lex mitior principle was also set out in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court¹⁵⁷ and in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.¹⁵⁸ Furthermore, the Grand Chamber noted that it had been recognized by the Court of Justice of the European Communities as forming part of the constitutional traditions common to the member States and, therefore, a part of the general principles of Community law.¹⁵⁹

In reversing existing precedent, the Grand Chamber said that 'a long time has elapsed since the Commission gave the above-mentioned X v. Germany decision and that during that time there have been important developments internationally'.¹⁶⁰ Consequently, it concluded that since the Commission decision in X v. Germany 'a consensus has gradually emerged in Europe and internationally around the view that application of a criminal law providing for a more lenient penalty, even one enacted after the commission of the offence, has become a fundamental principle of criminal law'.¹⁶¹ It said that the lack of express mention of such an obligation in article 7 of the Convention was not a 'decisive' argument.¹⁶² The Court said that this conclusion was 'consistent with the principle of the rule of law, of which Article 7 forms an essential part' in that a trial court should apply the punishment that the legislator considers proportionate.¹⁶³

Inflicting a heavier penalty for the sole reason that it was prescribed at the time of the commission of the offence would mean applying to the defendant's detriment the rules governing the succession of criminal laws in time. In addition, it would amount to disregarding any legislative change favourable to the accused which might have come in before the conviction and continuing to impose penalties which the State—and the community it represents—now consider excessive. The Court notes that the obligation to apply, from among several criminal laws, the one whose provisions are the most favourable to the accused is a clarification of the rules on the succession of criminal laws, which is in accord with another essential element of Article 7, namely the foreseeability of penalties.¹⁶⁴

Several members of the Grand Chamber dissented, disputing the notion that the lex mitior principle had some visceral link with the principle of legality enshrined in article 7(1). They described lex mitior as a 'different kind of norm' that did no more than express a choice in the criminal law policy of States.¹⁶⁵ They noted that the drafters of article 7(1) had considered including the lex mitior principle but that they had decided against it. Citing Johnston and Others v. Ireland, they acknowledged the importance of evolutive interpretation but said that it did not permit the Court 'to derive from these instruments a right which was not included therein at the outset. This is particularly so here, where the omission was deliberate.'¹⁶⁶

General principles of law recognized by civilized nations

Paragraph 2 of article 7 declares: 'This article shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations.' There is a corresponding provision in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, although the wording differs slightly: 'Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by the community of nations.' According to a Chamber of the Court, the provision consists of 'une clause de dérogation exceptionnelle au principe général contenu dans le premier'.¹⁶⁷ The two paragraphs of article 7 'are interlinked and are to be interpreted in a concordant manner'.¹⁶⁸

The wording evokes article 38(1)(c) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, where 'the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations' are identified as one of three sources of international law, the others being treaty and customary law. In that context, while apparently of equal status to the other two categories, in reality 'general principles' is very much of a subsidiary or supplementary source of law. It was apparently introduced into the formulation of sources of law in order to ensure that there were no gaps in the applicable international law.¹⁶⁹ Public international law jurisprudence has never found specific crimes to be contemplated by the notion of 'general principles of law'. Somewhat analogous expressions have been used to describe genuinely international crimes. In the Corfu Channel case, the International Court of Justice spoke of 'elementary considerations of humanity, even more exacting in peace than in war'.¹⁷⁰ In its Advisory Opinion on Reservations to the Genocide Convention, the Court said the Convention contained 'principles which are recognised by civilised nations as binding on States, even without any conventional obligation'.¹⁷¹

According to the Convention organs, the travaux préparatoires of the European Convention indicate that the intent behind this provision was to shelter the Nuremberg principles from attack on the grounds that they were contrary to the principle of legality set out in paragraph 1. The European Commission on Human Rights explained its understanding of the drafting of article 7(2) as follows:

The Commission recalls that it transpires from the preparatory work to the Convention that the purpose of paragraph 2 of Article 7 is to specify that this Article does not affect laws which, in the wholly exceptional circumstances at the end of the Second World War, were passed in order to punish war crimes, and collaboration with the enemy and does not in any way aim to pass legal or moral judgment on those laws.¹⁷²

The Court subsequently endorsed this position.¹⁷³ The words are drawn from a report by the Committee of Experts to the Committee of Ministers.¹⁷⁴ The simplistic statement about the significance of the travaux, based upon a sentence in the report of the Committee of Experts and without regard to the broader history of the provision, has ricocheted through the case law over the decades. It is not apparent, however, that this is a correct understanding of the travaux, and of the intent of those who drafted and adopted article 7(2).

The travaux préparatoires are examined earlier in this chapter. They indicate that the real debate about the text and the relationship between paragraphs 1 and 2 took place in sessions of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights concerning what was to become article 15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.¹⁷⁵ The concern was to ensure that crimes under international law, both codified and those that were emerging, as they had done at Nuremberg, would not be deemed contrary to the nullum crimen principle. The two paragraphs are largely redundant, as some delegates in the Commission insisted, because crimes under international law are already addressed in paragraph 1 and general principles of law are a source of international law.¹⁷⁶ To the extent that paragraph 2 contributes to the normative framework, in keeping with the principle of effectivity of treaty provisions, it seems appropriate to consider that it contemplates prosecutions for international crimes before they have in fact been codified. This was the situation with respect to both crimes against peace and crimes against humanity at the International Military Tribunals that sat in Nuremberg and Tokyo. There are some contemporary examples at the ad hoc international criminal tribunals, where judges have addressed the nullum crimen challenge by referring to customary international law rather than 'general principles'.¹⁷⁷ The suggestion in the formulaic phrase of the European Commission that it is meant to cover 'war crimes, and collaboration with the enemy' is not sustainable. Simply put, 'collaboration with the enemy' is not an international crime. To the extent that prosecutions took place following the Second World War for such an offence in the absence of legal provisions that were foreseeable and accessible, there is indeed a conflict with the principles stated in article 7 of the Convention. In this respect, it is of interest that when the scope of article 7(2) was considered by the Grand Chamber, the words 'war crimes, and collaboration with the enemy' were replaced by 'inter alia war crimes'.¹⁷⁸

As early as 1957, the European Commission referred to article 7(2) in declaring inadmissible an application by a Belgian journalist who had been convicted as a Nazi collaborator, although the decision did not indicate of what consisted the 'general principles' he was alleged to have violated.¹⁷⁹ The reasoning is not very clear. Following the interpretation proposed above, that ruling by the European Commission was wrong. In several subsequent decisions involving Second World War crimes where the Court has dismissed the application, it has confined itself to article 7(1) and declared that it was unnecessary to consider article 7(2).¹⁸⁰

In Kononov v. Latvia, the Chamber did not find there had been a breach of article 7(1). Consequently, it was unnecessary to address the question of article 7(2). Nevertheless, it opined that 'even supposing that that paragraph was applicable in the instant case, the operation of 27 May 1944 cannot be regarded as "criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations"'.¹⁸¹ The act in question was a summary execution conducted against non-combatants who were apparent enemy sympathizers and who had arguably participated actively in the hostilities, although they were obviously hors de combat at the time of the killing. In Kolk and Kislyiy v. Estonia, the Court invoked article 7(2) as a response to a charge that prosecution of crimes against humanity in the immediate post-Second-World-War period was contrary to article 7(1). In this connection, the Court asserted that the Charter of the International Military Tribunal affirmed that crimes against humanity could not be time-barred.¹⁸²

Some interpreters of the Convention have argued against the suggestion that article 7(2) be confined solely to prosecutions related to the Second World War. They point to a substantial evolution in international criminal law and to the on-going work of codification, insisting that 'general principles of law' should not be cast in post-Second-World-War stone, but rather should take account of future developments.¹⁸³ The recent tendency of the Court, however, has been to disregard article 7(2) entirely.¹⁸⁴ In a case concerning the State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina, it dismissed an argument from the government invoking article 7(2) as being 'inconsistent with the travaux préparatoires which imply that Article 7 § 1 can be considered to contain the general rule of non-retroactivity and that Article 7 § 2 is only a contextual clarification of the liability limb of that rule, included so as to ensure that there was no doubt about the validity of prosecutions after the Second World War in respect of the crimes committed during that war'. The Grand Chamber said: 'It is thus clear that the drafters of the Convention did not intend to allow for any general exception to the rule of non-retroactivity. Indeed,

The reference is puzzling, because the International Military Tribunal laid down no such principle, nor would it have any reason for doing so, given the temporal proximity of the crimes it was dealing with. In support of this affirmation, the Court invoked a decision of the Commission, Touvier v. France, no. 29420/95, Commission decision of 13 January 1997, DR 88-B, p. 161, where reference is made to an opinion by the French Minister of Foreign Affairs that 'it could be inferred from the Charter of the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal that the prosecution of crimes against humanity was not subject to limitation'. The finding of the Commission was subsequently adopted by a Chamber of the Court in Papon v. France (no. 2) (dec.), no. 54210/00, 15 November 2001, and in turn by Judge Myjer in his concurring opinion in Kononov v. Latvia, no. 36376/04, 24 July 2008.

the Court has held in a number of cases that the two paragraphs of Article 7 are interlinked and are to be interpreted in a concordant manner.¹⁸⁵

Whether or not any useful autonomous role can be found for paragraph 2, legal history shows that the concerns of some experts involved in the drafting were misplaced. Article 7(1) of the Convention (and, consequently, article 11(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights) is entirely sufficient to shelter the post-war prosecutions for atrocity crimes from attack. To the extent there was uncertainty about the scope of international law in the 1940s, this has entirely dissipated in modern times. If the scope of article 7(2) is confined to international crimes, it seems unnecessary and redundant. International crimes do not raise issues of retroactivity because of the explicit reference to them in article 7(1). However, most of the discussion of article 7(2) seems to concern international offences, particularly war crimes and crimes against humanity.¹⁸⁶ No doubt this vision of article 7(2) is nourished by the reference to 'general principles of law', language that pertains to sources of international law. But within international law, 'general principles of law' is actually a reference to norms found in national law. This apparent tautology is useful as a way to incorporate broadly accepted principles such as res judicata and lis pendens into the international forum but it does not work in the same way when national courts rely upon international law sources derived from national law as an answer to complaints of retroactive prosecution.

Some of the early jurisprudence of the European Commission refers to crimes of treason and collaboration with the enemy. While of some importance in the 1950s and 1960s, such crimes are rarely seen in modern times. Even here, it is not apparent why article 7(2) would be necessary. Presumably, European states at the time of the Second World War had adequate criminal legislation dealing with treason and assisting the enemy in wartime.

Discrimination

There do not appear to have been any findings of discrimination by which article 7 and article 14 of the Convention are associated. It has rarely been invoked by applicants, and complaints are almost invariably dismissed in a summary manner.¹⁸⁷

In the German border guards cases, the Court briefly considered the argument that article 7 had been breached in a discriminatory manner, the differential treatment being a consequence of the applicants' status as citizens of the German Democratic Republic. The European Court considered that the principles applied by the Federal Constitutional Court in Germany were of 'general scope and were therefore equally valid in respect of persons who were not former nationals of the GDR'.¹⁸⁸

The application of laws on statutory limitation were also challenged on the grounds of a discriminatory effect. In an earlier decision, the Court had considered statutory limitation to be a matter of procedure rather than substance.¹⁸⁹ It upheld this approach, noting that such laws do not define crimes and punishments, and only establish conditions of admissibility.¹⁹⁰ As for the article 14 claim, the Court said the applicant was treated in the same manner as those similarly situated, that is, whose trials were at the same stage.¹⁹¹

Reservations

There have been two reservations to article 7, rare examples of such a practice with respect to a non-derogable right. At the time of ratification, in 1952, Germany formulated a reservation with respect to article 7(2):

Conformément à l'article 64 de la Convention, la République Fédérale d'Allemagne fait la réserve qu'elle n'appliquera la disposition de l'article 7, alinéa 2 de la Convention que dans les limites de l'article 103, alinéa 2 de la Loi Fondamentale de la République Fédérale d'Allemagne. Cette dernière disposition stipule : 'Un acte ne peut être puni que si la loi le déclarait punissable avant qu'il ait été commis.'¹⁹²

Upon ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Germany did not make any reservation to article 15(2), which is similar in import to article 7(2) of the European Convention. Germany withdrew its reservation to article 7(2) in 2001.¹⁹³

Portugal made a reservation to article 7 respecting a provision of its Constitution governing indictment and trial of officers and personnel of the State Police Force.¹⁹⁴

Article 8. Right to respect for private and family life/Droit au respect de la vie privée et familiale

1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

1. Toute personne a droit au respect de sa vie privée et familiale, de son domicile et de sa correspondance.

2. Il ne peut y avoir ingérence d'une autorité publique dans l'exercice de ce droit que pour autant que cette ingérence est prévue par la loi et qu'elle constitue une mesure que, dans une société démocratique, est nécessaire à la sécurité nationale, à la sûreté publique, au bien-être économique du pays, à la défense de l'ordre et à la prévention des infractions pénales, à la protection de la santé ou de la morale, ou à la protection des droits et libertés d'autrui.

Introductory comments

The ancestor of the right to private and family life would appear to be the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States: 'The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures...'. In a creative interpretation of that provision, Louis Brandeis discerned a 'right to privacy', or 'a right to be left alone'.¹ In 1947, when John Humphrey canvassed the provisions of national constitutions and various draft human rights declarations and charters in his preparation of an initial draft of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, he identified a distinct category that he labelled 'Liberty of and respect for private life'. The text that Humphrey proposed read: 'No one shall be subjected to arbitrary searches or seizures, or to unreasonable interference with his person, home, family relations, reputation, privacy, activities, or personal property. The secrecy of correspondence shall be respected.'² Of the European sources considered, there was something loosely resembling this formulation in the constitutions of Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Iceland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, and Sweden. When the negotiating process was completed some two years later, the final version of article 12 of the Universal Declaration read: 'No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.'

This is an area where technological developments have had a huge impact. Expectations by previous generations of a sphere of anonymity have changed as a result of various forms of collection and transfer of data. For many people, concerns about privacy that once seemed important have become insignificant. Today, in massive numbers individuals seek to share information about their lives and those around them with the virtually limitless audience that social media provide. Whereas once the taking of a photograph was an event surrounded by planning and almost invariably a degree of implied consent, the proliferation of cameras makes the capture and sharing of images essentially uncontrollable. Where once intrusions into the private sphere seemed exceptional and rare, technology has made them common and mundane. For many, the sensitivities of the past no longer seem so important.

The corresponding provision in the Charter of Fundamental Rights differs very slightly in formulation:

Article 7. Respect for private and family life

Everyone has the right to respect for his or her private and family life, home and communications.

It is meant to have the same meaning and scope as article 8 of the European Convention.³

Drafting of the provision

Both paragraphs of article 8 of the Convention can be traced directly to provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted on 10 December 1948 by the United Nations General Assembly. Article 8(1) is derived from article 12 of the Declaration: 'No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.' The progenitor of article 8(2) is article 29(2) of the Declaration: 'In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society.'

The 'Liste des Droits de l'Homme à protéger par la Cour européenne (présentée comme base d'étude' adopted by the International Council of the European Movement, in February 1949, included '[l]a protection contre toute immixtion dans la famille' and '[l]a protection du caractère sacré du foyer'.⁴ The draft convention adopted by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement on 12 July 1949 recognized '[t]he natural rights deriving from marriage and paternity and those pertaining to the family' and '[t]he sanctity of the home'.⁵ The European Movement draft also contained a restrictions or limitations clause: 'The rights specified in Articles 1 and 2 shall be subject only to such limitations as are in conformity with the general principles of law recognized by civilised nations and as are prescribed by law for: a) Protecting the legal rights of others; b) Meeting the just requirements of morality, public order (including the safety of the community), and the general welfare.⁶

At the first session of the Consultative Assembly, which met in August and September 1949, Pierre-Henri Teitgen called for adoption of a convention that was to include 'the natural rights deriving from marriage and paternity and those pertaining to the family, the sanctity of the home...'⁷ Contributing to the introductory debate in the Assembly, Mario Cingolani of Italy spoke of 'unbelievable encroachments on our rights' such as 'the violation of the sanctity of the home'.⁸ James Everett of Ireland referred to the fact that in many countries 'raiding of citizen's homes without warrant is also practised by governments on minorities',⁹ while Ireland's Sean MacEntee urged the inclusion of article 12 of the Universal Declaration 'without reservation'.¹⁰

In the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions of the Consultative Assembly, Teitgen presented a list that questioned the inclusion of 'natural rights appertaining to marriage, paternity and the family' and 'inviolability of domicile'.¹¹ Asked to prepare a text for discussion in the Committee, Teitgen proposed the following: 'Inviolability of privacy, home, correspondence and family, in accordance with Article 12 of the United Nations Declaration.'¹²

One of the United Kingdom delegates, Lord Layton, argued for exclusion of the provision. According to the draft report, the inclusion of 'family rights', including arbitrary interference family life, 'raised, within the Committee, various objections based on the fact that in this case no fundamental "political" rights were at stake... This argument did not prevail, since the majority of the Committee thought that the racial restrictions on the right of marriage made by the totalitarian regimes as also the forced regimentation of children and young persons organised by these regimes should be absolutely prohibited.'¹³ Layton's resolution was rejected by sixteen votes against to three in favour. The Committee then voted to amend Teitgen's proposal as follows: 'Immunity from arbitrary interference in his private life, his home, his correspondence and his family as laid down in Article 12 of the Declaration of the United Nations'.¹⁴

In the report of the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions to the plenary Consultative Assembly, the word 'all' was added before 'arbitrary' and the masculine pronouns removed.¹⁵ Something was being lost in translation from the French, which appears to have been the primary language of the negotiations. Some of the problems were fixed in the Committee's final report to the Consultative Assembly. The word 'all' disappeared and 'immunity' (from the French immunité) was replaced by the more appropriate 'freedom': 'Freedom from arbitrary interference in private and family life, home and correspondence, in accordance with Article 12 of the Declaration of the United Nations'.¹⁶ This was not in fact in accordance with article 12 because the words 'nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation' were omitted.

Presenting the report of the Committee to the plenary Consultative Assembly, Teitgen explained that there had been discussion in the Committee about including 'family rights', as he called them:

No one in the Committee, I hasten to add, has denied the vital importance of these family rights. Some have said that they would prefer to see the guarantee confined for the moment to essential civic freedoms, to those which are the necessary conditions for the functioning of democratic institutions, and that it would be better for the time being to exclude all other freedoms and all other fundamental rights which would include, in spite of their importance, family rights.

The Committee recalled the time in the recent past when, in some countries, certain people were denied the right to marry on account of race or religious convictions. It also recalled the legislation, under which some countries suffered during cruel years, which subordinated the child to the benefit of the state.

On account of these memories, the majority of the Committee considered it desirable to include these fundamental rights in the list of guaranteed freedoms. It considered that the father of a family cannot be an independent citizen, cannot feel free within his own country, if he is menaced in his own home and if, every day, the State steals from his soul, or the conscience of his children.¹⁷

Layton resumed the debate, explaining that the proposed list of fundamental rights for the convention was 'not intended to be anything like a complete list of human rights. It is a selected list of rights which should be the subject of collective guarantee, and guaranteed now'.¹⁸ Layton insisted upon a short list that 'should be limited to the absolute minimum necessary to constitute the cardinal principles for the functioning of political democracy'.¹⁹ He pointed to the much longer list in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adding that he thought that all of the States represented in the Consultative Assembly were already 'parties to this Declaration'.²⁰ In fact, there are no 'parties' to the Universal Declaration, which is a resolution of the United Nations General Assembly; moreover, two members of the Consultative Assembly, Ireland and Italy, were not yet members of the United Nations.

Layton's proposal was criticized by Sean MacEntee of Ireland, who said its adoption would 'seal the triumph of the totalitarian ideologies'. For MacEntee, '[t]he outstanding feature of the totalitarian regimes was the ruthless and savage way in which they endeavoured to wipe out the concept of the family as the natural unit of society'.²¹

Delegates from the Netherlands,²² Italy,²³ and France²⁴ made similar statements. Recognizing the isolation of his position, Layton agreed to its withdrawal.²⁵ The Consultative Assembly adopted the text proposed by the Committee.²⁶

Teitgen had also included a general provision on the restriction or limitation of rights that was based upon the text in the European Movement Draft.²⁷ After a short debate without a vote, the Consultative Assembly adopted the following text:

In the exercise of these rights, and in the enjoyment of the freedoms guaranteed by the Convention, no limitations shall be imposed except those established by law, with the sole object of ensuring the recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others, or with the purpose of satisfying the just requirement of public morality, order and security in a democratic society.²⁸

Although bearing a close affinity to article 12 of the Universal Declaration, the words 'nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation' had been excluded from the Consultative Assembly draft.²⁹ This discrepancy was noted in a report prepared by the Secretariat-General of the Council of Europe. It considered that incorporation of the entire text of article 12 of the Universal Declaration was implied by the fact that it was annexed to the report prepared by Teitgen for the Consultative Assembly.³⁰

The Committee of Experts, meeting in February and March 1950, was divided on the general approach to the formulation of human rights in the Convention, with some members favouring a relatively laconic enumeration based upon the Universal Declaration, while others preferred a more expansive and detailed text akin to that of the draft Covenant then being negotiated in the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. The current version of the draft Covenant did not then include any provision dealing with private and family life. Pursuing the simplified enumeration approach, the Committee of Experts adopted the following provision: 'No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference.'³¹ The report of the Committee explains that instead of listing rights with reference to the relevant provision in the Universal Declaration, as had been done by the Consultative Assembly, it was better to incorporate the text verbatim. Accordingly, the Committee of Experts, as it explained in its Report, 'scrupulously adhered to the text of the Universal Declaration'.³² The text it adopted is, of course, very close to that of article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts removed the words 'or attacks' that follow 'interference' in the Universal Declaration, and it maintained the exclusion of the reference to honour and reputation that it had inherited from the Consultative Assembly. The report of the Committee of Experts to the Committee of Ministers notes that '[i]n accordance with the Assembly's intentions, only a certain part of the rights mentioned in [Article 12] of the Universal Declaration were included'.³³ The second, contending approach considered by the Committee of Experts was formulated in a draft submitted by the United Kingdom. It dispensed entirely with the provision on private and family life.³⁴

The Committee of Experts also adopted a general provision on restrictions or limitations:

In the exercise of these rights and in the enjoyment of the freedoms secured by the Convention, no limitation shall be imposed except those established by the law, with the sole object of ensuring the recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others, or with the purpose of satisfying the just requirements of public morality and order and national security and integrity (and solidarity) as well as the functioning of administration and justice in a democratic society.³⁵

The Report of the Committee of Experts explained that it had decided to add 'to the number of higher interests, the demands of which might justify the limitation of human rights, two further restrictions: a) territorial integrity; b) the smooth working of administration and justice'.³⁶ It said that the first of these had been introduced on the proposal of the Turkish representative 'in order to make provision for the need of States to be able to defend themselves against all activities which might lead to the disintegration of the nation'.³⁷ This was accepted by the Committee of Experts 'on the clear understanding that it did not permit a restriction on the rights of national minorities to press their views by democratic means', to which the Turkish representative responded that the proposal 'had no connection with the question of the rights of national minorities, a question which, moreover, would be outside the scope of the Convention'.³⁸ The second limitation, 'the smooth working of administration and justice', was introduced by the Swedish expert so as to make provision for the fact that sometimes 'certain information should be kept secret'.³⁹

The Committee of Experts concluded its work with the submission to the Committee of Ministers of two different drafts. The first, 'Alternatives A and A/2', consisted of the text adopted by the Committee of Experts at its first session derived generally from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.⁴⁰ The second, labelled 'Alternatives B and B/2', was essentially the draft of the Convention proposed by the United Kingdom, a text based on the 1949 draft of the International Covenant adopted by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.⁴¹

The Conference of Senior Officials that convened in June 1950 assigned a Drafting Committee to attempt to reconcile the competing approaches, using the British text as its starting point. In the case of the right to private and family life there was nothing to reconcile, given the absence of any provision in the British draft. The Drafting Committee prepared new versions of the various substantive provisions, melding the formulation of rights in the two versions, with the exception of private and family life, which was left blank in its initial report.⁴² When the issue was pointed out by the President of the Conference of Senior Officials, Sir Samuel Hoare explained that the contents of the provision were covered by other articles dealing with freedom of association and information.⁴³

It then fell to the United Kingdom to propose a new provision on private and family life:

1. Everyone shall have the right to freedom from governmental interference with his privacy, family, house or correspondence.
2. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of this right other than such as are in accordance with law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime or for the protection of health or morals.⁴⁴

This text was changed significantly by the Drafting Committee, notably in the elimination of the limitation of the right to 'government interference': 'The right to privacy in respect of family, home and correspondence shall be recognised.'⁴⁵ The second paragraph was also altered by replacing '[n]o restrictions shall be placed on' with '[t]here shall be no interference by a public authority with' and a change from 'and are necessary' to 'and is necessary'. The plenary Conference of Senior Officials further reworked the text: 'Everyone's right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence shall be recognised.'⁴⁶ The words 'this right' were changed to 'these rights'.

Earlier, in their 'definitional' proposal within the Committee of Experts, the British had introduced the idea of distinct clauses concerning restriction or limitation specifically tailored to the right and freedom in question. However, there was no limitations clause for the right to private or family life because the right had been omitted entirely in the British draft. Once the British draft was accepted by the Conference of Senior Officials as a basis for further negotiation, any work on a general limitations clause was essentially set aside in favour of specific provisions applicable to individual rights. The British duly presented a draft paragraph 2 governing the right to private and family life:

No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of this right other than such as are in accordance with law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime or for the protection of health or morals.⁴⁷

The Drafting Committee changed this text significantly, essentially by the inclusion of the notion of 'interference by a public authority' that the British had placed in paragraph 1:

There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of these rights except such as is in accordance with law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime or for the protection of health or morals.⁴⁸

By this change, the Drafting Committee opened up the right to private and family life to positive obligations, in that the interference need not be the work of a public authority, although, of course, the obligation to enforce the right remains with the State and its institutions.

The text of article 8(1) was modified yet again by the Committee of Ministers: 'Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.'⁴⁹ The United Kingdom commented upon the draft text of article 8(2), which of course it had itself proposed only weeks earlier:

In its present form this Article does not provide either for the rules under which the party to a civil action may be compelled to give disclosure of his documents to the other party or for the powers of inspection (for example the opening of letters which are suspected of attempting to export currency in breach of Exchange Control Regulations) which may be necessary in order to safeguard the economic well-being of the country. H.M. Government, therefore, propose an amendment to paragraph 2 of this Article to read: '... in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others'.⁵⁰

In the text adopted by the Conference of Senior Officials, article 8(1) read: 'Le droit de toute personne au respect de sa vie privée et familiale, son domicile ou sa correspondance est reconnu.'

⁵⁰ Amendments proposed by the United Kingdom Delegation, Doc. CM 1 (50) 6, A 1867, V TP 66-70 (italics in the original).

The draft text of paragraph 2 was then amended by a Sub-Committee of the Committee of Ministers:

There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.⁵¹

The only subsequent modification to article 8 by the Committee of Ministers was replacing 'rights' with 'right' in the final words of paragraph 2.⁵²

The provision on private and family life did not give rise to discussion in the August 1950 session of the Consultative Assembly. The version confirmed at the fifth session of the Committee of Ministers in August 1950 is therefore the definitive one. Only two very minor changes were introduced at Rome in November 1950: the addition of the article 'the' before 'law' in paragraph 2, and the replacement of 'right' with 'rights' in the final words of the provision.

The heading of article 8, 'Right to respect for private and family life', was added pursuant to Protocol No. 11.⁵³

Analysis and interpretation

The Court's judgments have stated again and again that '[t]he essential object of Article 8 is to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by public authorities'.⁵⁴ The wording suggests a profoundly negative 'right to be left alone', and yet most of the case law has focused on the positive dimension of the right. The State is required, by article 8, to ensure a broad range of entitlements in areas ranging from housing to medical treatment, from the control of stray dogs to bullying at school to ensuring that people may end their lives in dignity. According to the Court, 'it is under Article 8 that notions of the quality of life take on significance'.⁵⁵ The constantly expanding protection of private and family life has taken litigation under the European Convention on Human Rights deep into the realm of private law. In recent years, article 8 has proven to be one of the richest areas of legal development by the Court.

The provision is divided into four categories: private life; family life; home; and correspondence. The heading of article 8 narrows this to 'private and family life' and indeed the jurisprudence of the first two categories is overwhelming by comparison with the relatively few cases that concern home and correspondence. There is no neat dividing line between private and family life, and certain problems, such as the right of settled migrants to remain where they are,⁵⁶ an entitlement to registration of marriage,⁵⁷

childbirth,⁵⁸ and matters concerning the dead,⁵⁹ may be examined under both rubrics.⁶⁰ Some settled migrants will not have adequate family ties in the country, so their claim will have to be based upon the right to private life.⁶¹ In practice, the proportionality analysis is likely to be much the same.⁶² In the case of an applicant who had been adopted and who contested her inability to obtain information about her birth and origins, the Court chose 'to examine the case from the perspective of private life, not family life, since the applicant's claim to be entitled, in the name of biological truth, to know her personal history is based on her inability to gain access to information about her origins and related identifying data'.⁶³

Like articles 9, 10, and 11, the definition of the right in the first paragraph of article 8 is complemented by a second paragraph that restricts or limits the scope of the right. The restriction or limitation clauses in the four articles have many broad similarities but they are also somewhat distinct, each having been specifically tailored to the right in question. In its application of article 8, the Court first proceeds to consider whether there has been an 'interference' with a right within the scope of paragraph 1. It then, as a general rule, examines the criteria set out in paragraph 2 in order to determine whether the 'interference' is also a violation of the Convention. Occasionally, however, judgments of the Court with respect to article 8 do not present any detailed discussion of the criteria in paragraph 2. After deciding that article 8 is applicable, they attempt to assess the 'inconvenience' that the interference creates for the applicant, sometimes concluding that it is significant enough to find a violation,⁶⁴ while in other cases adopting the view that it is not.⁶⁵

This chapter proceeds with consideration of the scope of the right set out in article 8(1), followed by a section dealing with restrictions or limitations that may be imposed in accordance with paragraph 2.

Respect—negative and positive obligations

Article 8(1) is the only substantive provision of the Convention where the word 'respect' is employed. The word also appears in the title of article 1, a consequence of Protocol No. 11. Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, from which article 8(1) of the Convention was derived, does not use the word 'respect' either. The Court has said that the notion of 'respect' is not 'clear-cut', 'especially where the positive obligations implicit in that concept are concerned'.⁶⁶ One of the aspects of 'respect' that has been highlighted in the case law is the rule of law. It is one of the fundamental principles of a democratic society and inherent in all provisions of the Convention.⁶⁷ The rule of law dictates the existence of measures of legal protection against arbitrary interference by public authorities with the right protected by the Convention.⁶⁸ To the extent that it encapsulates the obligatory nature of article 8, at the heart of the word 'respect' sit both positive and negative dimensions. The State must not only abstain from interference with private and family life, but it must also protect individuals from infringements of their right to private and family life that are attributable to others.⁶⁹

Despite the distinction between positive and negative obligations under article 8, the applicable principles in the two contexts are similar in nature. It is not always evident whether an interference results from a denial of a right in a negative sense or a failure of the State to provide an adequate regulatory framework, nor does the Court always find it necessary to decide on which basis the matter should be studied.⁷⁰ Whether private and family life is approached from a positive or negative perspective, due regard must be had to 'the fair balance that has to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole'.⁷¹

Whether a negative or positive understanding of article 8 is adopted, in both the State enjoys a certain margin of appreciation. In cases requiring the State to strike a balance between competing rights, the margin of appreciation will be greater if one individual's right to private and family life may be infringed as a result of exercise by another of a fundamental right.⁷² On the other hand, '[w]here a particularly important facet of an individual's existence or identity is at stake, the margin allowed to the State is correspondingly narrowed. The same is true where the activities at stake involve a most intimate aspect of private life.'⁷³ Difficulties arise in particular with respect to freedom of expression. Here a proper balance must be struck between the private and family life of the individual and the public interest in access to information through a free media.⁷⁴

Where relations between individuals are concerned, the means chosen by a State to address this are in principle something within their margin of appreciation.⁷⁵ Certainly,

States are required to have an adequate legal framework providing protection against acts of violence by others,⁷⁶ although recourse to the criminal law is not necessarily the only approach, especially for acts of lesser seriousness.⁷⁷ Where 'fundamental values and essential aspects of private life are at stake... [e]ffective deterrence is indispensable in this area and it can be achieved only by criminal-law provisions'.⁷⁸ In assessing the adequacy of the criminal justice system, the Court will consider whether there were 'significant flaws' in the investigation of the alleged crime.⁷⁹ When the legislation comes to be examined, however, the issue is no longer whether there are 'significant flaws', but rather 'whether the respondent State had in place an adequate legal framework in compliance with its positive obligations under Article 8 of the Convention since the issue before the Court concerns the question of whether the law afforded an acceptable level of protection to the applicant in the circumstances'.⁸⁰

Private life

The Court has explained that 'private life' is a broad term encompassing the sphere of personal autonomy within which everyone can freely pursue the development and fulfilment of his or her personality and establish and develop relationships with other persons and the outside world.⁸¹ The Parliamentary Assembly has described 'the right to privacy' as set out in article 8 as 'the right to live one's own life with a minimum of interference'.⁸² The Convention organs have explained that the right to private life is not susceptible to precise or exhaustive definition.⁸³ The Universal Declaration of Human Rights as well as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights enshrine a right to 'privacy', whereas the European Convention speaks of 'private life'. This difference, which does not seem to have any legal consequences, may be related to the important role of the French language in the drafting of the European Convention, 'private life' being a somewhat awkward rendering of 'vie privée'.

With respect to 'private life', the interpretation of article 8 is 'underpinned by the notions of personal autonomy and quality of life'.⁸⁴ According to the Court's case law, private life encompasses 'a person's physical and psychological integrity; the guarantee afforded by Article 8 of the Convention is primarily intended to ensure the development, without outside interference, of the personality of each individual in his relations with other human beings'.⁸⁵ It is not limited to the protection of an 'inner circle', where 'the individual may live his own personal life as he chooses and to exclude therefrom entirely the outside world not encompassed within that circle. It also protects the right to establish and develop relationships with other human beings and the outside world'.⁸⁶ This has sometimes been described as a 'zone of interaction between a person and others which, even in a public context, may fall within the scope of "private life"'.⁸⁷

Physical, psychological, and moral integrity

Private life includes the 'physical and psychological integrity' of the individual. Somewhat less frequently, reference has also been made to 'moral integrity'.⁸⁸ The positive aspect of the obligation is of particular significance, and article 8 requires the State 'to maintain and apply in practice an adequate legal framework affording protection against acts of violence by private individuals'.⁸⁹ Article 8 may also extend to questions relating to the effectiveness of a criminal investigation.⁹⁰ Especially when physical, psychological, and moral integrity are concerned, there is a relationship between article 8 and article 3.⁹¹ The latter imposes a threshold of a minimum level of severity for its application.⁹² When this is not met, treatment that is not a violation of article 3 may nevertheless breach the private life aspect of article 8 if the effects are sufficiently adverse.⁹³

The extent of the State's positive obligation to protect against attacks on physical and psychological integrity may even extend to problems of bullying in schools.⁹⁴ The failure of the authorities in Bucharest to take sufficient measures to address an endemic problem of stray dogs, some of them dangerous to humans, was held to infringe upon the respect of private life.⁹⁵

Health and medical care

Together with physical and moral integrity, health falls within the scope of private life.⁹⁶ Although it cannot be excluded that medical care may result in violations of article 3 of the Convention, the Court generally prefers to consider these matters from the standpoint of article 8.⁹⁷ Here there are conflicts between the State's interest in protecting the lives and health of its citizens and the individual's right to personal autonomy.⁹⁸ According to the Court, although the Convention does not guarantee 'any specific level of medical care', private life 'includes a person's physical and psychological integrity'. Moreover, 'the State is also under a positive obligation to secure to its citizens their right to effective respect for this integrity'.⁹⁹

Issues arise with respect to consent to medical treatment. As the Court has explained, 'a medical intervention in defiance of the subject's will gives rise to an interference with respect for his or her private life, and in particular his or her right to physical integrity'.¹⁰⁰ According to the Court, '[i]n the sphere of medical assistance, even where the refusal to accept a particular treatment might lead to a fatal outcome, the imposition of medical treatment without the consent of a mentally competent adult patient would interfere with his or her right to physical integrity contrary to article 8'.¹⁰¹ Similarly, forced administration of drugs will constitute an interference with the right to private life, subject to justification according to the criteria of article 8(2).¹⁰² An exception to this general principle might be vaccination during an epidemic, as it would be necessary to protect third parties. Otherwise, 'the State must abstain from interfering with the individual freedom of choice in the sphere of health care, for such interference can only lessen and not enhance the value of life'.¹⁰³

Competing interests also present themselves where patients with a dismal prognosis seek authorization to use medication that is not generally available, because it has not obtained regulatory approval. In some European jurisdictions, exceptions are available for such cases, and the Court said 'there is now a clear trend in the Contracting States towards allowing, under certain exceptional conditions, the use of unauthorised medicinal products'.¹⁰⁴

Reproductive health is an area of special importance in the protection of private and family life. It is an area of some sensitivity because of fascist practices in Europe during the first half of the twentieth century. The decision to have a child, as well as the decision not to have a child, certainly falls within the right to private life.¹⁰⁶ In a case dealing with sterilization of a Roma woman following childbirth without full and informed consent, the Court held there was a breach of article 3, but also insisted on examining whether, pursuant to article 8, the State had put in place effective legal safeguards to protect the reproductive health of women of Roma origin.

The Court notes that the documents before it indicate that the issue of sterilisations and its improper use affected vulnerable individuals belonging to various ethnic groups. However, the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights was convinced that the Roma population of eastern Slovakia had been at particular risk. This was due, inter alia, to the widespread negative attitudes towards the relatively high birth rate among the Roma compared to other parts of the population, often expressed as worries of an increased proportion of the population living on social benefits. In the Commissioner's view, the Slovakian Government had an objective responsibility in the matter because of systemic shortcomings in the procedures permitted and, in particular, for failing to put in place adequate legislation and exercise appropriate supervision of sterilisation practices.¹⁰⁷

Noting a systematic mention of Roma origin in the medical dossier, the Court said that 'the reference in the record to the applicant's ethnic origin, without more, indicates, in the view of the Court, a certain mindset on the part of the medical staff as to the manner in which the medical situation of a Roma woman should be managed'. It certainly did not indicate that 'special care was to be, or was in fact, exercised to ensure that the full and informed consent of such a patient was obtained before any sterilisation was contemplated or that the patient was involved in the decision-making process to a degree permitting her interests to be effectively protected'.¹⁰⁸

Private life incorporates a right to become a parent. In cases where access to artificial insemination facilities has been refused, it has been held that article 8 incorporates the right of a couple to respect for their decision to become genetic parents.¹⁰⁹ More generally, the Grand Chamber has stated 'the right of a couple to conceive a child and to make use of medically assisted procreation for that purpose'.¹¹⁰ In addition, 'the right concerning the decision to become a parent includes the right of choosing the circumstances of becoming a parent', such as giving birth at home rather than in a hospital.¹¹¹

Legislation regulating the interruption of pregnancy concerns private life because 'whenever a woman is pregnant her private life becomes closely connected with the developing foetus'.¹¹² But pregnancy is not exclusively about a woman's private life, which 'must be weighed against other competing rights and freedoms invoked including those of the unborn child'.¹¹³ State regulations dealing with therapeutic abortion must be 'assessed against the positive obligations of the State to secure the physical integrity of mothers-to-be'.¹¹⁴ The abortion cases before the Convention organs have generally arisen in European jurisdictions where the practice is severely restricted, notably Poland¹¹⁵ and Ireland.¹¹⁶ While the Court has held that article 8 cannot be interpreted as conferring a right to abortion, it has found that the prohibition of abortion when sought for reasons of health and well-being falls within the scope of the right to respect for private life.¹¹⁷ In A, B, and C, the Grand Chamber declared that there is 'a consensus amongst a substantial majority of the Contracting States of the Council of Europe towards allowing abortion on broader grounds than accorded under Irish law', but said this could not displace Ireland's margin of appreciation on the subject.¹¹⁸

According to the Court, the first requirement of such strict regulation is that it 'ensure clarity of the pregnant woman's legal position'.¹¹⁹ It has warned that a broad legal prohibition on abortion, subject to therapeutic exceptions, coupled with a threat of criminal prosecution for those who perform abortions, 'can well have a chilling effect on doctors when deciding whether the requirements of legal abortion are met in an individual case'.¹²⁰ Thus, '[o]nce the legislature decides to allow abortion, it must not structure its legal framework in a way which would limit real possibilities to obtain it'.¹²¹ Procedures to determine availability of a legal abortion must be accessible to the pregnant woman and undertaken diligently, bearing in mind the time-sensitive nature of such determinations. A failure to provide genuine possibilities of determination according to law may result in a violation of article 8.¹²²

The unavailability in Italy of assisted pregnancy accompanied by genetic tests was successfully challenged by parents of a child afflicted with cystic fibrosis. The government expressed its concerns about eugenic practices, as well as the protection of the health of mother and child, together with the dignity and freedom of conscience of health-care professionals. Noting that Italy allowed the abortion of a foetus where cystic fibrosis was present, the Court cited a 'manque de cohérence' in the applicable legislation.¹²³

Associated with the health aspect of private life is the right of effective access to information concerning health and reproductive status. This is similar in nature to the right to information concerning environmental hazards, discussed elsewhere in this chapter. But it also seems related to an entitlement to consult one's own medical records. The Court has acknowledged that the authority or individual detaining the file may determine the arrangements for consultation, as well as provisions concerning the cost of copying. The data subject should not be required to justify a specific request in order to obtain a copy of a personal file; rather, it is for the authorities to justify any refusal of such access.¹²⁴

Employment and professional activities

The Court has often applied article 8 in the area of employment law and to the exercise of professional and business activities.¹²⁵ According to the Court, '[r]estrictions on an individual's professional life may fall within Article 8 where they have repercussions on the manner in which he or she constructs his or her social identity by developing relationships with others'.¹²⁶ Moreover, the Court has pointed out that it is in the course of their working lives that the majority of people are able to develop relationships with the outside world:

[P]rofessional life often overlaps with private life, in the strict sense of the term, such that it is not always easy to distinguish clearly in what capacity an individual is acting at a given moment of time. In sum, professional life is part of the zone of interaction between a person and others which, even in a public context, may fall within the scope of 'private life'.¹²⁷

Nevertheless, the application of article 8 to professional activities is not open-ended. For example, it does not guarantee a right to recruitment to the civil service¹²⁸ or to freedom of profession.¹²⁹ But when the law society in Athens had initially allowed a non-citizen to proceed with qualification to become a practicing lawyer, apparently by mistake, only to refuse her the right to continue subsequently, the Court said that the 'comportement des autorités compétentes a manqué de cohérence et de respect pour la personne et la vie professionnelle de la requérante', concluding that article 8 had been infringed.¹³⁰

There are many cases of the application of article 8 in the employment context. For example, the decisions of Jehovah's Witnesses whether to take full-time or part-time and paid or unpaid employment were matters that fell within the sphere of their private lives.¹³¹ A Spanish priest, married with five children, claimed he lost his job because of his views on Catholic celibacy. The Court considered that the issue was balancing the State's positive obligation to protect his private life against the Catholic Church's decision to refuse renewal of his contract, bearing in mind the latter's rights under articles 9 and 11.¹³² The Court described a prohibition on seeking employment outside of the civil service that lasted more than six years placed upon a senior police official who was suspended on suspicion of corruption as 'néfaste et prolongé' and said it affected his private life.¹³³

The Convention organs have been cautious in applying article 8 to political activities.¹³⁴ They have taken the view that article 8 must be read in harmony with article 3 of Protocol No. 1 and that it should not take its place when, for example, a State has withdrawn the application of article 3 to a particular territory.¹³⁵ Referring to its case law on freedom of expression concerning media coverage of the lives of political figures, the Court noted that political activity 'is very much a matter of public life, to which Article 8 can have only limited application'.¹³⁶

Personal autonomy and identity

The notion of personal autonomy plays an important role in the application of article 8. It provides protection to the personal sphere of an individual, including the right to establish details of his or her identity as a human being.¹³⁷ This extends to various aspects of an individual's 'social identity', including name and image as well as religion, ethnicity, and sexual orientation.¹³⁸

Although article 8 does not explicitly refer to the protection of the name as part of private life, the Convention organs have often considered it to be applicable to this issue.¹³⁹ Name is important because it links an individual to the family, with its special role in both articles 8 and 12. It is also germane to the identity of the individual within a community defined by nationality, ethnicity, and religion. However, the right of women to inherit titles of nobility was held to fall outside the scope of article 8; a claim that reserving such titles to male descendants constituted discrimination was inadmissible for this reason.¹⁴⁰ Latvian legislation requiring that when a woman takes the name of her husband upon marriage it must be spelled in accordance with Latvian linguistic rules was deemed to infringe article 8 because 'when a couple choose to use the same name, that name assumes importance as a testimony to their reciprocal attachment and to the unity of the family' and 'when the applicant and her husband use their respective passports, which contain different written forms of their surname, their joint identification as a family unit may, in certain situations, become difficult'.¹⁴¹ The role of the name in the respect of private life extends to the given name.¹⁴²

Respect for the right to private life requires that every individual be able to determine the details of his or her identity.¹⁴³ According to the Court, the right to private life comprises acknowledgement that individuals have 'a vital interest, protected by the Convention, in establishing the biological truth about an important aspect of their private and family life and having it recognised in law'.¹⁴⁴ This necessarily involves the determination of paternity, which falls under the scope of article 8.¹⁴⁵ Sometimes the identity of the mother is also unknown. As the child matures, he or she may seek to learn about the biological parents. The child has a right to know his or her origins, something that is a component of private life; the failure to obtain such information may imply mental and psychological suffering.¹⁴⁶ The origins go beyond birth and extend to 'the information necessary to know and to understand their childhood and early development'.¹⁴⁷ Nevertheless, the mother may have a right 'in remaining anonymous in order to protect her health by giving birth in appropriate medical conditions'.¹⁴⁸ Even if the mother cannot be compelled to reveal her identity, a child should have access to mechanisms so that this can be explored and in order to obtain certain relevant information.¹⁴⁹ The right to this personal and social identity comprises an entitlement to registration of a marriage.¹⁵⁰

Dress and other features of personal appearance are matters that concern private life. According to the Grand Chamber, 'personal choices as to an individual's desired appearance, whether in public or in private places, relate to the expression of his or her personality and thus fall within the notion of private life'.¹⁵¹ There have also been many decisions of the Court concerning clothing (and the lack of it) in application of articles 9 and 10 of the Convention. The Court has already held that shaving the head of a prison inmate constitutes a breach of article 3.¹⁵² The less drastic measure of a haircut may not have reached the required level of seriousness and was therefore addressed under article 8.¹⁵³ A measure that emanates from a public authority that restricts a choice of dress, such as a ban on wearing clothing designed to conceal the face in public places, is in principle an interference with article 8.¹⁵⁴ In the case of the 'naked Rambler', who chose to go without clothes in public so as to make a public statement of his belief in the inoffensive nature of the human body, the Court said that article 8 could not be taken to protect every conceivable personal choice about one's desired appearance in public. '[T]here must presumably be a de minimis level of seriousness as to the choice of desired appearance in question', it said, adding that '[w]hether the requisite level of seriousness has been reached in relation to the applicant's choice to appear fully naked on all occasions in all public places without distinction may be doubted, having regard to the absence of support for such a choice in any known democratic society in the world'.¹⁵⁵

A person's image is an important attribute of personality 'as it reveals the person's unique characteristics and distinguishes the person from his or her peers'.¹⁵⁶ Consequently, the individual is entitled to control the use of the image, including the right to refuse publication of a photograph and to object to the recording, conservation, and reproduction of the image by another person. Otherwise, as the Court has explained, 'an essential attribute of personality would be retained in the hands of a third party and the person concerned would have no control over any subsequent use of the image'.¹⁵⁷ There are particular concerns about technical developments in filming and photography that make it possible to store and reproduce personal data.¹⁵⁸ In some European States, measures have been considered in order to address the phenomenon of illicit or covert filming of individuals, including criminalization where personal integrity is compromised.¹⁵⁹ Video surveillance by an employer in order to detect theft by employees was held to infringe article 8(1), although the Court considered that it struck an appropriate balance bearing in mind the rights of the employer and the probability of success in catching a dishonest worker. But in rejecting the application, the Court said that this 'might well be given a different weight in the future, having regard to the extent to which intrusions into private life are made possible by new, more and more sophisticated technologies'.¹⁶⁰

Publication of photos involves a balancing of freedom of expression, including the rights of a free press with the right to private life. One of the factors to be considered by the Court in determining whether there has been an interference with article 8 is a contribution to an area of general interest. Obviously political issues and crime falls in the category of general interest,¹⁶¹ but it also includes sporting issues and performing artists.¹⁶² But rumours of marital problems of a head of State and financial troubles of a performing artist do not meet this criterion.¹⁶³ Nor is the fact that a person is the subject of criminal proceedings sufficient to curtail the protection of article 8 with respect to publication of a photo.¹⁶⁴

A second factor concerns the notoriety of the person and the nature of the activities in the photograph. The Court operates a distinction between political or public figures and private individuals who may be acting in a public context. Consequently, 'whilst a private individual unknown to the public may claim particular protection of his or her right to private life, the same is not true of public figures'.¹⁶⁵ Along the same lines, the Court distinguishes between reporting facts that may contribute to democratic debate about the activities of politicians exercising their functions and the reporting of details of the private life of a person with no public functions.¹⁶⁶ Prior conduct of the individual may also be significant, although previous cooperation with the media does not automatically deprive the person of protection against publication.¹⁶⁷ Also, the Court will consider the content and form of the publication,¹⁶⁸ and the extent of its dissemination.¹⁶⁹ Finally, the manner in which the photo was taken will be taken into account: did the person consent or was it done surreptitiously?¹⁷⁰

Identity documents are essential in modern life. Issues relating to their issuance may result in an interference with article 8. A passport or identity card is essential for international travel, but also for routine requirements of the daily life of a person living abroad. Confiscation and non-restitution of a passport may raise issues under article 8,¹⁷¹ although the provision does not guarantee an entitlement to a passport.¹⁷² The failure to invalidate a driving licence promptly after it was reported missing made possible the abuse of an individual's identity by others and constituted an interference with article 8.¹⁷³ According to the Court, 'swift administrative action to deprive a driving license of its usefulness as an identity document was possible and practicable', and was something the Government failed to do, with the consequence that article 8 was breached.¹⁷⁴

¹⁷⁵ The right to a nationality is enshrined in article 4(a) of the European Convention on Nationality, ETS 166.

Human Rights.¹⁷⁶ Nor does it contain a right to legal personality, set out in article 6 of the Universal Declaration.¹⁷⁷ To some extent, however, these rights can be vindicated through article 8 of the European Convention. The Slovenian citizenship legislation case provides a good example. Following the breakup of the former Yugoslavia, legislation governed the grant of Slovenian nationality to citizens of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Within a few years, the legislation resulted in several thousand residents within Slovenia who belonged to other ethnic groups within the former Yugoslavia becoming stateless. The situation was addressed in reports of the Council of Europe's Commission of Human Rights and the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance, as well as the United Nations Committee for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Committee Against Torture. Ultimately, the Grand Chamber found that the citizenship scheme and the resulting statelessness for certain individuals violated article 8 as well as article 14 of the Convention.¹⁷⁸

Ethnicity is a component of an individual's identity that is protected by article 8.¹⁷⁹ The European Commission took the view that 'a minority group is, in principle, entitled to claim the right to respect for the particular life style it may lead as being "private life", "family life" or "home"'.¹⁸⁰ Not only is this an entitlement of the person's own dignity and integrity, it may also be relevant to identity documents and with respect to entitlements in areas such as schooling. Whether ethnicity is a matter of individual choice, and therefore entirely subjective, or something that has an objective existence subject to proof is a matter that has vexed international law for nearly a century.¹⁸¹ The Court has acknowledged that in recognizing the ethnicity of an individual, objective evidence of what is claimed may be required. Moreover, 'it should be open to the authorities to refuse a claim to be officially recorded as belonging to a particular ethnicity where such a claim is based on purely subjective and unsubstantiated grounds'.¹⁸² Nevertheless, where an individual can provide objective evidence of belonging to an ethnic group or minority, the State should provide a mechanism so that the identity can be established officially.¹⁸³

Although issues concerning ethnicity often manifest themselves in claims for various rights related to identity, and to that extent they are not 'private', although they may belong to the 'private sphere', article 8 should also protect those who do not wish to divulge their ethnic origins or identity. In the case of religion, the Court has already affirmed that 'information about personal religious and philosophical conviction concerns some of the most intimate aspects of private life'. Therefore, imposing an obligation upon parents to provide school authorities with information about their religion or their philosophical beliefs might well be an interference with article 8.¹⁸⁴

Any negative stereotyping, when it reaches a certain level, is capable of impacting on the group's sense of identity and the feelings of self-worth and self-confidence of its members. It is in this sense that the private life of members of the group may be affected.¹⁸⁵ In the case of a Turkish book presenting somewhat stereotyped views of Roma, the Court did not find the comments excessive, and rejected the application. At the heart of the debate was a balancing of article 8 and the right to freedom of expression set out in article 10.¹⁸⁶ The Court concluded likewise with respect to a related complaint about negative stereotypes of Roma found in a dictionary prepared for Turkish students. The Court said it would have been preferable to indicate 'pejorative' or 'insulting' next to the impugned definitions, but that alone was not enough to support a violation of article 8.¹⁸⁷

In a few cases, the Court has accepted the relationship between article 8 and the rights of persons with disabilities. For example, the requirement that a disabled person pay a military service exemption tax that was imposed on persons deemed unfit to serve in the army for health reasons, 'that is, a factor outside the person's control', was clearly covered by article 8, 'even if the consequences of the measure are above all pecuniary'.¹⁸⁸ However, in the case of holiday access to a private beach and to the sea by a disabled person, the Court said the matter 'concerns interpersonal relations of such broad and indeterminate scope that there can be no conceivable direct link between the measures the State was urged to take in order to make good the omissions of the private bathing establishments and the applicant's private life'.¹⁸⁹

Sexual life and activity

Gender identification, sexual orientation, and sexual life are details of individual identity that come within the sphere protected by article 8.¹⁹⁰ Unlike nationality and ethnicity, this is a 'most intimate aspect of private life', where the Court has said 'there must exist particularly serious reasons before interferences on the part of the public authorities can be legitimate'.¹⁹¹ After initially rejecting applications by transsexuals seeking recognition of their new identity in official documents,¹⁹² on the grounds that this fell within the margin of appreciation of States, the Court moved towards recognition of a positive obligation to recognize the gender change in transsexuals who had undergone surgery.¹⁹³ It moved still further, finding a violation of article 8 where gender change surgery had not been completed, the delays being attributable to legal inadequacies and shortcomings in the public health system.¹⁹⁴

In a series of cases, the Court held that legislation criminalizing homosexual activity between two consenting adults was a violation of article 8.¹⁹⁵ The influence of its jurisprudence in this area was felt as far away as the United States, where three judgments of the European Court of Human Rights were cited approvingly in an exceedingly rare reference to international human rights law by the majority of the Supreme Court.¹⁹⁶ Subsequently, the European Court of Human Rights enlarged this finding to include criminalization of sexual activity involving more than two participants.¹⁹⁷

Presumably, article 8 now protects most adult sexual activity of any sort as long as it is in private and there are no public health considerations. There are still some exceptions, however—'not every sexual activity carried out behind closed doors necessarily falls within the scope of Article 8'¹⁹⁸—although legal history may suggest that they will not last very much longer. One remaining taboo is the incestuous relationship, where the Court has observed that 'a broad consensus transpires that sexual relationships between siblings are neither accepted by the legal order nor by society as a whole'.¹⁹⁹ Indeed, 'domestic authorities enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in determining how to confront incestuous relationships between consenting adults, notwithstanding the fact that this decision concerns an intimate aspect of an individual's private life'.²⁰⁰ The Court has also used article 8 to address forms of discrimination and inequality based upon identity, including sexual orientation. It held that the inquiry and subsequent expulsion into sexual orientation of members of the United Kingdom armed forces was an interference with the right to private life.²⁰¹

In a case involving a sexual orgy with rather disturbing forms of sado-masochism, on its own motion the Court asked whether this even fell within the scope of private life, given that there were many participants and the proceedings were recorded on a video-tape that was then circulated.²⁰² Many years later, the Court noted that this issue had not been contested between the parties to the litigation, and that all it had done was 'raise a question' about the matter. In a case involving the filming of homosexual activity of several men, where there was no evidence to suggest the materials would ever be made public, the Court considered that article 8 was applicable.²⁰³

Death and dying

The right to decide when and by what means one's life will end is part of private life protected by the Convention, subject to the person being capable of freely making such a decision and acting upon it.²⁰⁴ Dealing with the especially difficult case of a person at the terminal stage of an incurable degenerative disease who argued that she had a right to prevent what she considered to be 'an undignified and distressing end to her life', the Court said it was 'not prepared to exclude' that preventing a person from exercising a choice to avoid dying in such a way was an interference with her right to respect for private life and therefore within the ambit of article 8.²⁰⁵ A decade later it took a more certain position, holding 'that an individual's right to decide by what means and at what point his or her life will end, provided he or she is capable of freely reaching a decision on this question and acting in consequence, is one of the aspects of the right to respect for private life within the meaning of Article 8 of the Convention'.²⁰⁶ It has explained that '[w]ithout in any way negating the principle of sanctity of life protected under the Convention, the Court considered that, in an era of growing medical sophistication combined with longer life expectancies, many people were concerned that they should not be forced to linger on in old age or in states of advanced physical or mental decrepitude which conflicted with strongly held ideas of self and personal identity'.²⁰⁷ However, the Court has declined to extend its reasoning to a full-blown 'freedom to die'. It has stopped short of recognizing that someone who is not infirm may nevertheless have a right to commit suicide with dignity.²⁰⁸

In cases involving death and dying, the applicants are often close relatives of the deceased person. The Court has often made no distinction as to whether the matter concerns private life or family life. Article 8 was held to apply when the authorities delayed the return of a child's body to the parents following an autopsy.²⁰⁹ Similarly, it was relevant to the wish of an individual that his ashes be spread over his own land.²¹⁰ Regulations prohibiting the removal of an urn from one gravesite to another so that it could be closer to the home of surviving relatives was deemed an interference with article 8.²¹¹ The Court has also held that article 8 entitles the mother of a stillborn child 'to attend the burial of her child, possibly accompanied by a ceremony, and to have the child's remains transported in an appropriate vehicle'.²¹²

1. Everyone has the right to the protection of personal data concerning him or her.
2. Such data must be processed fairly for specified purposes and on the basis of the consent of the person concerned or some other legitimate basis laid down by law. Everyone has the right of access to data which has been collected concerning him or her, and the right to have it rectified.
3. Compliance with these rules shall be subject to control by an independent authority.²¹⁴

The right to private life protects individuals against disclosure of information concerning them that is in the possession of public authorities.²¹⁵ The counterpart of the protection of confidential data is its availability to the individual under appropriate circumstances. For example, according to the Court there is a positive obligation on the authorities to make a full, frank, and complete disclosure of the medical records of a deceased child to the latter's parents.²¹⁶

To fall within the scope of article 8, the information or data in question need not be private in the sense that it is confidential. Where public information is systematically collected and stored in official files, article 8 may be engaged.²¹⁷ This includes information collected in public, such as photographs and other materials gathered and stored by security services.²¹⁸ Medical data brings with it special issues:

Respecting the confidentiality of health data is crucial not only for the protection of a patient's privacy but also for the maintenance of that person's confidence in the medical profession and in the health services in general. Without such protection, those in need of medical assistance may be deterred from seeking appropriate treatment, thereby endangering their own health.²¹⁹

In a Polish case where the availability of legal abortion had stimulated considerable public interest, the hospital in question issued a press release about the situation and provided information to journalists. The hospital said it did not reveal the name of the individual concerned, but she was apparently readily identifiable and was in fact contacted by many people. For the Court, 'the fact that the issue of the availability of legal abortion in Poland is a subject of heated debate does not confer on the State a margin of appreciation so wide as to absolve the medical staff from their uncontested professional obligations regarding medical secrecy'.²²⁰ The collection and storage of data by means of a satellite navigation device attached to a person's car has been held to constitute an interference with private life.²²¹

Here the Court insists, as it does in other areas of private and family life, upon the existence of a proper legislative framework for the collection and protection of information and data of a personal nature. It is important to have 'minimum safeguards concerning, inter alia, duration, storage, usage, access of third parties, procedures for preserving the integrity and confidentiality of data and procedures for their destruction, thus providing sufficient guarantees against the risk of abuse and arbitrariness'.²²² The need for proper regulation is all the greater if data are processed automatically. According to the Court, there must be regulations to ensure that 'such data are relevant and not excessive in relation to the purposes for which they are stored; and preserved in a form which permits identification of the data subjects for no longer than is required for the purpose for which those data are stored'.²²³ The importance of a regulatory framework is imposed both by the notion of the rule of law, which is in the background of every provision of the Convention, and by the requirement that any restrictions on private life be 'in accordance with law', as set out in article 8(2).

Information in the form of fingerprints, cellular samples, and DNA may be collected and retained for the purposes of prevention and detection of criminal activity. In this regard, '[t]he interests of the data subjects and the community as a whole in protecting the personal data, including fingerprint and DNA information, may be outweighed by the legitimate interest in the prevention of crime'.²²⁴ Nevertheless, what the Court has called the 'intrinsically private character of this information' dictates careful scrutiny of any measures that authorize its retention and use without the consent of the individual concerned.²²⁵ Information about minor forms of misconduct and criminal activity may be stored centrally and over time become forgotten by everyone involved, only to return inadvertently because of some form of automatic disclosure. Yet as this information 'recedes into the past, it becomes a part of the person's private life which must be respected'.²²⁶ Thus, over time, data that was not part of a person's private life may become so. A requirement that persons convicted of sexual offences inform the police of their name, address, and other personal details falls within the scope of article 8.²²⁷

Honour and reputation

The thief of my purse steals trash, explains Iago in Shakespeare's Othello, 'but he that filches from me my good name/Robs me of that which not enriches him, And makes me poor indeed'.²²⁸ Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, from which article 8 of the Convention is derived, provides explicit protection against attacks upon 'honour and reputation'. The absence of these words in article 8—apparently an intentional omission by the drafters—does not mean, however, that the matter is not comprised within the scope of private life. In particular, issues arise because of the tension between article 8 and article 10, where the freedom of the press is at stake. Perhaps somewhat surprisingly, it was only in 2004 that the Court explicitly recognized 'the right of the persons attacked . . . to protect their reputation, a right which is protected by Article 8 of the Convention as part of the right to respect for private life'.²²⁹ Subsequently, it framed this as a positive obligation to protect the reputation of the individual.²³⁰

Threats to honour and reputation do not only result from media activity. In one case, the Court considered that a domestic judgment 'conveyed information to the effect that the High Court, having regard to the state of the evidence, held a suspicion that the applicant had sexually abused' his son. As an authoritative judicial decision, it was likely to carry great significance by the way it stigmatized him and was capable of having a major impact on his personal situation, as well as his honour and reputation, thereby engaging article 8.²³¹

Not every attack on honour and reputation will amount to an interference with private and family life. The attack 'must attain a certain level of gravity and in a manner causing prejudice to personal enjoyment of the right to respect for private life'.²³² In another formulation, the Court said 'reputation had been deemed to be an independent right mostly when the factual allegations were of such a seriously offensive nature that their publication had an inevitable direct effect on the applicant's private life'.²³³

In a Slovakian case involving domestic violence, where the wife had attacked her husband, no criminal charge was laid because he refused to make a formal complaint. Then, the insurance company learned of the allegation from the police file and sought recovery of medical expenses from her. Noting that she had not been charged 'but was nevertheless placed on record as a criminal offender', the Court expressed its concern about 'the risk of stigmatisation of individuals stemming from such practices and the threat which they represent to the principle of the presumption of innocence'.²³⁴ It added that 'the damage which may be caused to the reputation of the individual concerned through the communication of inaccurate or misleading information cannot be ignored'.²³⁵ In one case it referred to the 'humiliation or injury' resulting from publication of articles, photographs, and video images of the applicant participating in sexual acts.²³⁶

Conviction for a crime in and of itself may impact upon a person's honour and reputation, but the Court has said that article 8 cannot be invoked to address the foreseeable consequences of one's actions such as perpetration of a criminal offence.²³⁷ Distinguishing the judgment in Laskey, Jaggard, and Brown, where article 8 was held to apply in the context of a conviction for sado-masochistic activities, the Court noted that it was 'the result of an unforeseeable application of a provision of the criminal law'.²³⁸

Search and seizure

In the development of human rights law, the origin of the right to private life seems to be the protection against 'arbitrary search and seizure' set out in article 4 of the United States

Constitution. This is the foundation upon which the right to privacy in American law has been built. Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognizes protection against search and seizure explicitly but the notion was removed by the drafters of article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Nevertheless, there seems to be no doubt that the general formulation of article 8 encompasses a protection against 'arbitrary search and seizure'.²³⁹

In assessing whether domestic law and practice provide adequate and effective safeguards to protect against arbitrary search and seizure,²⁴⁰ factors to be considered include whether the search was based on a warrant issued by a judge, grounded in reasonable suspicion, and of reasonably limited scope. The search of a lawyer's office requires the presence of an independent observer in order to protect the confidentiality of materials subject to professional secrecy.²⁴¹ The fact that the person subject to the search and seizure may subsequently be acquitted is of no consequence in assessing the search and seizure, whose reasonableness must be assessed at the time it is conducted or authorized.²⁴² The fact that a search takes place in public does not remove it from the scope of private life. Indeed, 'the public nature of the search may, in certain cases, compound the seriousness of the interference because of an element of humiliation and embarrassment. Items such as bags, wallets, notebooks and diaries may, moreover, contain personal information which the owner may feel uncomfortable about having exposed to the view of his companions or the wider public.'²⁴³

Prior judicial authorization of search and seizure may not always be possible. It is not contrary to article 8 provided that sufficient safeguards are in place to prevent abuse.²⁴⁴ The Court will impose an enhanced level of scrutiny when searches are undertaken without prior judicial authorization, for example when a stop-and-search policy is imposed under specific circumstances.²⁴⁵ In Amsterdam, the designation of certain areas where the authorities could do preventive searches essentially at random as a result of high levels of crime was justified by relevant and sufficient reasons and therefore necessary in a democratic society.²⁴⁶

Law enforcement authorities may use covert listening devices or 'bugs' in order to monitor conversations in a private residence or on the telephone. Clearly, issues relating to private life arise.²⁴⁷ With respect to telephone conversations,²⁴⁸ the Court has made a distinction between metering by the service provider, for billing and similar purposes, which does not per se offend article 8, and use of telephone data by law enforcement officials for the purposes of investigation. Release to the police of information about numbers that were telephoned by the telephone provider constitutes an interference with the right to private life.²⁴⁹ Nevertheless, although users of telecommunications and Internet services are entitled to the protection of their private lives, this may be limited when the resources themselves are used to violate the rights of others. In a Finnish case in which the Internet had been used for defamatory purposes, a legal impediment preventing the victim from uncovering the identity of the perpetrator was an interference with the rights protected by article 8.²⁵⁰

Monitoring and surveillance outside the home raise special issues. The Court has explained that because there are occasions 'when people knowingly or intentionally involve themselves in activities which are or may be recorded or reported in a public manner, a person's reasonable expectations as to privacy may be a significant, although not necessarily conclusive, factor' in establishing an interference with private life.²⁵¹ Thus, a person walking along the street is normally visible to all. Monitoring such a scene using technological means, such as closed-circuit television, 'is of a similar character'.²⁵² Article 8 only arises when a systematic, permanent record is made, such as video recording of public places²⁵³ and surveillance using GPS,²⁵⁴ because only then can the material that is gathered be made available subsequently to the general public.²⁵⁵

In the case of communications in the workplace by telephone or e-mail, and use of the Internet, employees may have a reasonable expectation of privacy.²⁵⁶

Issues concerning the environment have been addressed under article 8, where they may concern both private life and home. nuclear power station,²⁶⁶ road works,²⁶⁷ and a dental clinic.²⁶⁸ Several applications have concerned smells, attributable to such places as a waste-treatment plant,²⁶⁹ a pigsty,²⁷⁰ and a dump.²⁷¹ Where the municipal authorities in Italy failed to provide an adequate system of garbage collection, the Court concluded that there was a breach of article 8, even if the applicants could not demonstrate that this had consequences in terms of their own health.²⁷² Generally, such environmental issues will involve positive obligations, whereby the State is required to have an appropriate regulatory framework suitable of ensuring a safe and healthy environment.

The Court has used the term 'nuisance' to describe a variety of phenomena, involving noise, smell, and health hazards. For the matter to engage article 8, the alleged nuisance must attain 'the minimum level of severity required for it to amount to an interference with the applicants' rights to respect for their private lives and their homes'.²⁷³ The assessment of that minimum is relative and depends on all the circumstances: 'the intensity and duration of the nuisance, its physical or mental effects, the general context, and whether the detriment complained of was negligible in comparison to the environmental hazards inherent to life in every modern city'.²⁷⁴

With respect to the environment, the Court has attached special importance to the right of the public to access information enabling it to assess the dangers to which it may be exposed.²⁷⁵ Sometimes it has described this as the 'procedural aspect' of article 8.²⁷⁶

Family life

The notion of 'family' has an important place in international human rights law. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights describes the family as 'the natural and fundamental group unit of society', adding that it 'is entitled to protection by society and the State'.²⁷⁷ In addition to the important reference in article 8, family is central to the right set out in article 12 of the European Convention on Human Rights: 'Men and women of marriageable age have the right to marry and to found a family, according to the national laws governing the exercise of this right.' The obligations with respect to the right to family life are both negative and positive in nature: 'States are under an obligation to "act in a manner calculated to allow those concerned to lead a normal family life".²⁷⁸ Although the suggestion in article 12 might be that 'family' is about monogamous relationships between persons of opposite sex focused upon procreation, it is obvious that such a narrow conception bears no resemblance to the immense diversity in form and content of modern families in contemporary Europe. But article 8 does not guarantee the right to found a family.²⁷⁹ However, the Grand Chamber has found a violation of article 8 in the refusal of prison authorities to provide artificial insemination so that two people, one of whom was detained, could become genetic parents.²⁸⁰

The protection of family life presupposes the existence of a 'family'.²⁸¹ Family life is much broader than the relationship between a 'couple' with or without children. Early in its case law, the Court confirmed that a single mother and her child constituted a 'family'.²⁸² Similarly, 'family life' applies to the relationship between a single father and his adopted son.²⁸³ In other words, despite the terms of article 12, which might be taken to imply that a man and a woman of marriageable age is the starting point for a 'family', nothing of the sort emerges from the Court's case law. Rejecting an objection ratione materiae from France, the Court recognized the existence of 'family life' between a father and his son-and law.²⁸⁴ Family life may also exist between siblings,²⁸⁵ and between grandparents and grandchildren, although 'in normal circumstances the relationship between grandparents and grandchildren is different in nature and degree from the relationship between parent and child'.²⁸⁶

Whether or not 'family life' exists is a question of fact that depends upon the existence of close family ties.²⁸⁷ The Court has said that 'the notion of "family life" in Article 8 is not confined solely to marriage-based relationships but may also encompass other de facto "family ties" where sufficient constancy is present'.²⁸⁸ In determining whether a relationship amounts to 'family life' several factors may be considered, including whether a couple lives together, the length of their relationship, and whether they have demonstrated their commitment to each other by having children together or by any other means.²⁸⁹ The fact that a marriage may not be in accordance with national legislation does not in any way conflict with the existence of family life.²⁹⁰ However, in a case where a prisoner corresponded with a woman outside the prison, meeting her in person on one occasion, followed by the engagement of the two, the European Commission considered that 'more substantial ties' were required for family life between the couple and the woman's children to exist.²⁹¹

The Court initially resisted the idea that same-sex couples can invoke the protection of 'family life'.²⁹² Then, noting that 'rapid evolution of social attitudes towards same-sex couples has taken place in many member States', manifested in legislation giving legal recognition to the phenomenon within member States and the European Union, the Court said it was 'artificial to maintain the view that, in contrast to a different-sex couple, a same-sex couple cannot enjoy "family life" for the purposes of Article 8'. Therefore, 'a cohabiting same-sex couple living in a stable de facto partnership, falls within the notion of "family life", just as the relationship of a different-sex couple in the same situation would'.²⁹³

A child born from a relationship where the parties are living together 'out of wedlock' is ipso jure part of that "family" unit from the moment, and by the very fact, of the birth'.²⁹⁴ Nevertheless, biological kinship between a natural parent and a child is insufficient to constitute family life as it is meant by article 8 in the absence of further legal or factual elements that indicate the existence of a close personal relationship.²⁹⁵ Family life may also fall within the scope of article 8 even if it is only inchoate, notably when the fact that it has not crystallized is not attributable to the applicant.²⁹⁶ It is not unknown for the father of a child to be denied access altogether. In such cases, the fact that a relationship has not yet developed does not exclude the protection by article 8 of the rights of the father to have meaningful contact with the child.

Cases have arisen in various countries as a result of a rather ancient rule, whose influence seems derived from its inclusion in the French Code civil whereby, when a woman is married, no man other than the husband can have legal standing to assert paternity:

Having regard to the realities of family life in the 21st century... the Court is not convinced that the best interest of children living with their legal father but having a different biological father can be truly determined by a general legal assumption. Consideration of what lies in the best interest of the child concerned is, however, of paramount importance in every case of this kind... Having regard to the great variety of family situations possibly concerned, the Court therefore considers that a fair balancing of the rights of all persons involved necessitates an examination of the particular circumstances of the case.²⁹⁷

Relevant factors would be the existence of a close personal relationship between the biological parents and a 'demonstrable interest in and commitment by the father...

before and after the birth'.²⁹⁸ In a Maltese case where the presumption of paternity prevented the husband of the mother who was determined by DNA testing not to be the father, the Court questioned the Government's argument that 'such a radical restriction of the applicant's right to institute proceedings to deny paternity was "necessary in a democratic society". In particular, it has not been shown why society as a whole would benefit from such a situation.'²⁹⁹ It said the interest of the child in enjoying the 'social reality' of being the presumed father's child could not outweigh the latter's legitimate right to have the opportunity to contest paternity. It said that 'a situation in which a legal presumption is allowed to prevail over biological reality might not be compatible, even having regard to the margin of appreciation left to the State, with the obligation to secure effective "respect" for private and family life'.³⁰⁰

Close relationships that fall short of 'family life' will be entitled to protection within the scope of 'private life' rather than 'family life'.³⁰¹ The determination of the legal relationship between a man and a child where paternity is contested may involve 'family life', but it most certainly involves 'private life', and it is under that heading that the Court has generally addressed the issue.³⁰² Inheritance rights are closely linked to family life and fall under the scope of article 8.³⁰³

Relationships between parents and their children

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company is 'a fundamental element of "family life" within the meaning of Article 8 of the Convention'.³⁰⁴ When they are separated, parents have a right to be reunited with their children, with a corresponding obligation on the State to facilitate such a reunion.³⁰⁵ However, the fact that the family is united does not mean that family life is assured, in particular if it is detained as a unit. The detention of a family in difficult conditions may be an interference with the right to family life under article 8 of the Convention.³⁰⁶

The right is not absolute, however, and there may well be circumstances where family life does not entitle one or another of the parents, or both of them, to be together with their children. Nevertheless, 'restrictions placed by the domestic authorities on parental rights of access call for strict scrutiny as they entail the danger that the family relations between a young child and a parent will be effectively curtailed'.³⁰⁷ Splitting up a family 'is an interference of a very serious order' and it 'must be supported by sufficiently sound and weighty considerations in the interests of the child'.³⁰⁸

Difficulties arise in this respect when there are disputes about custody and access between the parents and sometimes with other members of the child's family,³⁰⁹ as well as when children are removed from their parents and taken into public care.³¹⁰ The natural family relationship is not terminated simply because the child has been taken into public care.³¹¹ Sometimes there is an international dimension, with parents and children separated as a consequence of abduction³¹² or the vagaries of immigration legislation. The paramount factor must be the best interest of the child.³¹³ Depending upon their nature and seriousness, the best interests of the child may prevail over that of the parents.³¹⁴ Assessing the child's best interests involves a number of factors and circumstances, notably the age and level of maturity, the wishes of the child, the presence or absence of the parents, and the environment and experiences.³¹⁵ It in the child's best interests that ties with his family be maintained except in cases where the family has proved particularly unfit and it is in the child's best interests to ensure his or her development in a safe and secure environment.³¹⁶ The Court has taken international conventions, especially the Convention on the Rights of the Child, into consideration in examining the issue of the best interests of the child.³¹⁷

Making assessments and determinations about the best interests of the child is not an exact science. Those with responsibility to protect children who make such judgments and assessments 'cannot be held liable every time genuine and reasonably held concerns about the safety of children vis-à-vis members of their family are proved, retrospectively, to have been misguided'.³¹⁸ As for the Court, it can rarely go much beyond the procedural dimension, striving to ensure that the process of determining the right of the parties under national law is fair, and not arbitrary.³¹⁹ It must ascertain 'whether the domestic courts conducted an in-depth examination of the entire family situation and of a whole series of factors, in particular of a factual, emotional, psychological, material and medical nature, and made a balanced and reasonable assessment of the respective interests of each person'.³²⁰ The Court is poorly equipped for the task, given the notorious length of proceedings in Strasbourg. Because children grow and evolve both physically and emotionally, meaningful determinations concerning access and custody must be made very quickly, indeed too quickly for the Court to react in a useful way. To take one example, in July 2011 a Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights declared that a June 2006 order of the Rome Youth Court giving custody to the father of a child, and ordering the return from Latvia where he had been taken by the mother in mid-2005, was in breach of article 8. When the impugned judgment was issued, the child was about four years old; by the time the European Court responded by affirming his rights and those of his mother under the Convention, he was nine.³²¹ Indeed, the Court itself has acknowledged that 'time is of the essence' in its oversight of national institutions: '[T]he adequacy of a measure is to be judged by the swiftness of its implementation, as the passage of time can have irremediable consequences for relations between the child and the parent who does not live with the child'.³²²

In contrast with custody and access disputes driven by the parents and relatives, when public authorities intervene to protect and sometimes remove children from their parents there must be a strong presumption that they are attempting to implement the best interests of the child. There is no debate in such cases about the existence of an interference with family life, which is obvious.³²³ The principles for assessing whether the interference can be justified are essentially the same as in access and custody cases; that is, the grounds invoked by the authorities for the restriction must be shown to be 'relevant and sufficient' and the decision-making process must be fair, affording due respect for the rights of the applicant.³²⁴ In determining the margin of appreciation, the Court normally distinguishes between infringements that are attributable to the State and those resulting from the acts of other individuals, whose rights must also be considered in striking the right balance. It does not seem to do this here, however, perhaps because of the overwhelming importance of the 'best interests of the child'.

Beyond limitations on access to children, there are more extreme forms of separation that may break the link altogether and permanently, including removal of parental rights and, ultimately, adoption. Removal of parental rights is 'a particularly far-reaching measure which deprives a parent of his or her family life with the child and is inconsistent with the aim of reuniting them'. Such measures are only to be applied in 'exceptional circumstances and can only be justified if they are motivated by an overriding requirement pertaining to the child's best interests'.³²⁵ In a case where deprivation was an automatic consequence of a conviction for a serious crime, the Court felt that the absence of access to a court to challenge or review the matter in the future failed to strike a fair balance between the interests of the child, the applicant, and society at large.³²⁶

Adoption entails a permanent rupture in the bond between natural parents and their offspring. Any decision in this area must be taken in the best interests of the child. Once adoption has been completed, the relationship between the child and the adopting parents becomes one contemplated by 'family life' and subject to article 8.³²⁷ From the standpoint of the Convention, a child who has been adopted is in the same legal position as if he or she were the natural or biological child of the adopting parents.³²⁸ Refusal by the courts to recognize a foreign judgment of adoption constitutes an interference with family life.³²⁹ Nevertheless, article 8 does not provide a right to adopt.³³⁰ Likewise, it does not provide a right of an adopting parent to bring an end to the adoption.³³¹

Some intermediate forms of adoption where the link with the biological parents is not entirely broken exist within certain legal systems. One of these is kefala, a type of Islamic adoption. The European Court of Human Rights has welcomed attempts to use such a system as a way to encourage the integration of children of foreign origin, thereby respecting cultural pluralism and balancing the public interest.³³² In adoption matters, the interpretation of article 8 is to be guided by the special provisions in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.³³³ absolute right for any category of non-citizen not to be removed from the country. However, that does not mean that expulsion of a non-citizen (or alien) cannot result, depending upon the circumstances, in a breach of article 8. The case law of the Court is replete with examples.³³⁵

International law recognizes the right of refugees to protection against refoulement but that is not the same thing at all as a right to remain within the country of asylum. As the European Court has often pointed out, 'a State is entitled, as a matter of international law and subject to its treaty obligations, to control the entry of aliens into its territory and their residence there'.³³⁶ Furthermore, nothing in the Convention guarantees a non-citizen the right to enter or reside in a particular country. Although article 14(1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognizes the right of everyone 'to seek and enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution', there is no echo of this provision in the European Convention.³³⁷

Expulsion cases arise in a number of circumstances. Sometimes it is the country to which the individual is being expelled that presents a problem because of the threat of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment, or of a violation of the right to life or a flagrant abuse of the right to a fair trial.³³⁸ Such cases will generally be dealt with pursuant to articles 2, 3, and 6. Cases of refugees in the sense of the 1951 Convention on the Status of Refugees and its Protocol also involve concerns about the country of origin. It must be shown that there is a well-founded fear of persecution for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group, or political opinion if the asylum seeker is returned. Special mechanisms exist in all European countries for the implementation of obligations under international refugee law. The European Court provides a level of subsidiary or complementary protection for individuals who find themselves unprotected because of various limitations in refugee law.

Many migrants who have settled in a European country may find themselves threatened with expulsion because they have lost their legal entitlement to remain. This may be the consequence of criminal activity. It may also result from some other infringement of the legal framework governing residence within the country. In some cases, where citizenship is not automatically the right of a person born in the country but rather depends upon the nationality of the parents, someone who has lived their entire life in a European country may be threatened with expulsion. The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe has recommended that long-term migrants who were born or raised in the host country not be expelled under any circumstances.³³⁹ The Court has not taken such an inflexible position, and has sometimes found that there is no violation of article 8 when, as a result of criminal activity, a person born in Europe is expelled to a country even if the connections with it are very limited.³⁴⁰

In all of these cases, issues may arise with respect to private and family life. Most of the litigation has focused on family life because the expulsion disrupts the family relationship. However, even where there are no substantial family ties, other attachments to the country may be examined under the heading of private life. That is because article 8 also protects the right 'to establish and develop relationships with other human beings and the outside world and can sometimes embrace aspects of an individual's social identity [and] it must be accepted that the totality of social ties between settled migrants and the community in which they are living constitutes part of the concept of "private life"'.³⁴¹ In practice, the analysis conducted by the Court will be the same. Although exceptionally, the State may be unable to show that the measure was provided by law or pursued a legitimate aim, in the vast majority of cases the issue will be the necessity of the expulsion and whether it was proportionate to the aim pursued.

If the commission of criminal offences in the home State is the justification for expulsion, the relevant considerations in making such determinations were set out in 2001 in Boultif v. Switzerland and have become known as the 'Boultif criteria':

- the nature and seriousness of the offence committed by the applicant;
- the length of the applicant's stay in the country from which he or she is to be expelled;
- the time elapsed since the offence was committed and the applicant's conduct during that period;
- the nationalities of the various persons concerned;
- the applicant's family situation, such as the length of the marriage, and other factors expressing the effectiveness of a couple's family life;
- whether the spouse knew about the offence at the time when he or she entered into a family relationship;
- whether there are children of the marriage, and if so, their age; and
- the seriousness of the difficulties which the spouse is likely to encounter in the country to which the applicant is to be expelled.³⁴²

There are additional factors in non-criminal cases, such as those involving issues of immigration status and regulation, including whether there are insurmountable obstacles in the way of the family living in the country of origin of one or more of them and whether there are factors of immigration control (for example, a history of breaches of immigration law) or other considerations of public order weighing in favour of exclusion.³⁴³ Subsequent case law has added some precision and developed new dimensions to this, especially in terms of the strength of social, cultural, and family ties with the European state by comparison with the country of destination and the role of the best interests of children affected by the measure.

The Court has said that 'it will be a rare case where a settled migrant will be unable to demonstrate that his or her deportation would interfere with his or her private life as guaranteed by Article 8'.³⁴⁴ This is mainly because 'the totality of social ties between settled migrants such as the applicant and the community in which they are living constitutes part of the concept of "private life" within the meaning of Article 8'.³⁴⁵ Thus, while family ties are very important and are emphasized in the Boutrif criteria, other factors concerning general integration into European society are of great significance.

The fact that the individual was born in the host country or moved there at an early age is important.³⁴⁶ In a Danish case, a young person of Somali origin had moved to Denmark with her family, where she had a residence permit. She had spent much of her life, from about seven to fifteen, in Denmark, had attended school there, spoke the language, and had important family ties in the country. When she was fifteen, her father took her to Kenya in order to care for her grandmother, who was in a refugee camp, and the applicant remained there for more than two years. When she sought to return, the Danish authorities refused to renew her residence permit. The Court held that 'it cannot be said that the applicant's interests have sufficiently been taken into account in the authorities' refusal to reinstate her residence permit in Denmark or that a fair balance was struck between the applicants' interests on the one hand and the State's interest in controlling immigration on the other'.³⁴⁷ As the Grand Chamber said in another case, 'it is self-evident that the Court will have regard to the special situation of aliens who have spent most, if not all, their childhood in the host country, were brought up there and received their education there'.³⁴⁸

Although family ties are not essential, and the issue of expulsion can be addressed solely from the standpoint of private life, in practice it is almost invariably an important aspect of the case. There has been considerable debate about the nature of the family ties. The Court has held that 'family life' cannot be invoked by adults who do not belong to the 'core family' and who have not been dependent members of the applicants' family.³⁴⁹ However, there are many cases concerning relatively young adults who base their claims on relationships with their parents and siblings and who are apparently not fully autonomous with families of their own making. In a deportation case concerning a 20-year-old who lived with his mother, step-father, and siblings, the Court accepted the existence of 'family life'.³⁵⁰ It made the same finding with an applicant who was 28 years old when proceedings began. He had moved to France at the age of five, where his parents and siblings also lived, and had resided there all his life with the exception of a period of imprisonment in Switzerland.³⁵¹ Some cases have required evidence of an 'additional element of dependence' in order to recognize the strength of 'family life' of adults and their parents.³⁵² If 'family life' was created at a time when those involved were aware of the uncertain immigration status and therefore the precarious nature of the relationship,³⁵³ exceptional circumstances will be required for the Court to hold that there has been a breach of article 8.³⁵⁴

In Nunez v. Norway, there was nothing compelling about the applicant's objection to expulsion, as she had repeatedly lied on her applications. But she had given birth to two minor children in Norway and it was the best interests of these children that tipped the balance in her favour. In this respect, the Court has created indirect rights for children that protect their parents from expulsion. Two dissenting judges expressed concern 'that this case will send the wrong signal, namely that persons who are illegally in a country can somehow contrive to have their residence "legitimised" through the expedient of marriage and of having children'.³⁵⁵

Detention or other measures depriving an individual of freedom necessarily entails limitations on private and family life. Nevertheless, 'it is an essential part of a detainee's right to respect for family life that the authorities enable him or, if need be, assist him, in maintaining contact with his close family'.³⁵⁶ The State may impose limitations on the number of visits and may require that they be supervised, possibly taking into account the nature of the offence, but this interference with 'family life' must meet the tests imposed by article 8(2) of the Convention.³⁵⁷

In an Italian case, two family visits per month were not deemed to violate article 8.³⁵⁸ But a prisoner in Ukraine, who was allowed a supervised visit of a few hours every three months for three family members, whereas he had a close 'inner' family of four people, was held by the Court to be contrary to the Convention.³⁵⁹ Extenuating circumstances, such as the presence of organized crime, may dictate more limited access rights. The Court has explained that 'given the specific nature of the phenomenon of organised crime, particularly of the Mafia type, and the fact that family visits have frequently served as a means of conveying orders and instructions to the outside, the —admittedly substantial— restrictions on visits, and the accompanying controls, could not be said to be disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued'.³⁶⁰

Home

The 'home' that is protected by article 8 is an autonomous notion. It is not dependent upon the qualification of the term in domestic law.³⁶¹ The notion of home is defined with respect to factual circumstances, in particular the existence of sufficient, continuous links with a given location.³⁶² It is also independent of the lawfulness of the occupation of the premises under domestic law, applying for example to improvised or makeshift accommodation³⁶³ and to non-traditional residences such as caravans or trailers.³⁶⁴ It is closely related to the other categories protected by article 8 because the home is normally the physical space where private and family life develops.³⁶⁵ The actual address of the 'home' is protected as a component of private life. Revealing the address of a public personality in a national newspaper was a violation both of privacy and home.³⁶⁶

The French version of the Convention, where the word domicile is employed, has a 'broader connotation than the word "home" and may extend, for example, to a professional person's office'.³⁶⁷ Despite a European Court of Justice ruling that article 8 of the European Convention is not applicable to business premises,³⁶⁸ the European Court of Human Rights ruled that it applied to an office because 'it is not always possible to distinguish clearly which of an individual's activities form part of his professional or business life and which do not'.³⁶⁹ In the case of corporate entities, they seem to be able to invoke the concept of 'home' to their business premises.³⁷⁰ However, the Court has refused to apply the notion to a laundry that did not serve as a residence.³⁷¹ It was dubious about whether 'home' might extend to an orchestra conductor's dressing room.³⁷²

Article 8 not only protects the physical existence of the 'home', it also ensures a quality of life that involves peaceful enjoyment.³⁷³ Many issues have arisen concerning various forms of nuisance that disrupt the peaceful enjoyment of home. These are also considered earlier in this chapter under the heading 'Environment'. The occupant of a home may or may not be its owner. Where the occupant also owns the property where his or her home is located, problems related to peaceful enjoyment may be raised under both article 8 of the Convention and article 1 of Protocol No. 1. In some cases, the Court will find a violation of article 8 and then decline to pronounce itself on article 1 of Protocol No. 1.³⁷⁴ In others, for example where expropriation is concerned, it may apply article 1 of Protocol No. 1 and consider that there is no need to look at article 8.³⁷⁵ Legal issues relating to tenancy may also arise, although the Court will generally consider that a dispute concerning a lease does not fall within the scope of article 8.³⁷⁶

When housing issues relate to social policy, especially in an urban or rural planning context, '[i]n so far as the exercise of discretion involving a multitude of local factors is inherent in the choice and implementation of planning policies, the national authorities in principle enjoy a wide margin of appreciation'.³⁷⁷ But 'where the right at stake is crucial to the individual's effective enjoyment of intimate or key rights', the margin of appreciation is not as broad.³⁷⁸ If the loss of the home is possible, some remedy or procedural vehicle should be available in order to ensure that rights under article 8 are not violated. The official tolerance of a community for a considerable period of time in spite of the fact that its title to property may not have been very certain is relevant and must be taken into consideration. Although the residents of an illegal community may not be able to claim a legitimate expectation to remain, '[t]he principle of proportionality requires that such situations, where a whole community and a long period are concerned, be treated as being entirely different from routine cases of removal of an individual from unlawfully occupied property'.³⁷⁹ If the State is the owner of the property, the exercise is simplified because there is no need to balance the rights of the occupant with those of another occupant with a possibly valid claim.³⁸⁰

Probably the most extreme form of a breach of the right to protection of the home takes place during conflict, when there may be mass expulsions and internal displacement. In Cyprus v. Turkey, the Grand Chamber condemned 'the complete denial of the right of displaced persons to respect for their homes', noting that it had no basis in law within the meaning of article 8(2) of the Convention. It said that the violation at issue had endured 'as a matter of policy since 1974' and that it was a continuing violation of article 8 'by reason of the refusal to allow the return of any Greek-Cypriot displaced persons to their homes in northern Cyprus'.³⁸¹

Correspondence

Both traditional mail and electronic messages, including those made in the context of business or professional relationships, fall within the ambit of 'correspondence' as well as generally under 'private life',³⁸² as do telephone calls³⁸³ and similar forms of communication.³⁸⁴ Special issues arise here concerning contestation of measures that interfere with correspondence when these are secret in nature.³⁸⁵ The matter is considered in the chapter of this volume dealing with article 34 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Correspondence of prisoners is routinely monitored. This amounts to an interference with the right to correspondence enshrined in article 8(1),³⁸⁶ although one that will often be acceptable through the application of article 8(2).³⁸⁷ The actual content of the correspondence is immaterial to the determination of whether there has been an interference with the right.³⁸⁸ Stringent standards apply to legal correspondence because it is in principle privileged in nature.³⁸⁹ Depending upon the circumstances, a similar strict approach may apply to medical correspondence of prisoners.³⁹⁰

Prison authorities need not assume the cost of all prison correspondence, although a problem will arise if financial hardship means an inmate is entirely deprived of the possibility of communication with the outside.³⁹¹ Turkish prison authorities invoked the cost of translation when they refused to transmit correspondence written in Kurdish. They said the prison had neither the staff nor the money to undertake translation. They explained that letters could be translated, at the applicants' expense, by a sworn translator. The letters could then be sent if they were deemed to be inoffensive. The Court noted that the conduct of the prison authorities was not in fact governed by any relevant regulations.³⁹² Consequently, it held that there was a violation of article 8 without having to rule on the core issue, which was whether correspondence could be withheld because of the language that was used.

Restriction and limitation (art. 8(2))

Article 8(2) authorizes 'interference' (in French, ingérence) with the rights to private and family life and to home and correspondence set out in paragraph 1. The paragraph is similar to, although not identical with, corresponding second paragraphs in articles 9, 10, and 11 of the Convention. Article 9(2) speaks of 'limitations', article 10(2) of 'formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties', and article 11(2) of 'restrictions'. These differences in terminology do not appear to have had any practical or substantive consequences in their application and interpretation by the Convention organs. Nevertheless, the somewhat different formulation of the clauses is not without consequences, depending upon the provision that the Court employs in analysing a given situation. For example, in the French burqa case, the Court noted that although 'public order' was a lawful ground for restriction under article 9(2), they were not mentioned in article 8(2).³⁹³

The ancestor of the four provisions is article 29(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: 'In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society.' The limitation clause in the Universal Declaration applies generally to all rights set out in the instrument, whereas the specific clauses of this nature in the European Convention, of which article 8(2) is an example, are tailored to the right at issue. It is noteworthy that although the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights has clauses similar to those of the European Convention in its formulation of the freedoms of religion, expression, peaceful assembly, and association, there is no restriction clause associated with the right to private and family life.³⁹⁴

The Convention organs have developed a flexible methodology for the interpretation and application of paragraph 2 in determining whether or not the interference with a right set out in the first paragraph of articles 8, 9, 10, and 11 is actually in breach of the Convention. The general framework is identical for each of the four provisions. Similar texts are also used with respect to some of the provisions in the Protocols: article 1 of Protocol No. 1 (protection of property); article 2(3) of Protocol No. 4 (freedom of movement); art. 2(2) of Protocol No. 7 (right of appeal in criminal matters).

In accordance with the law

An interference with article 8 must be, in the words of article 8(2), 'in accordance with the law'. The other three articles use the expression 'prescribed by law'. The French text of the four provisions uses the same wording (prévue par la loi), and this provides confirmation that the different formulations in the English text are without any legal significance.³⁹⁵ A decade after the adoption of the Convention, when Protocol No. 4 was being drafted, the Committee of Experts preferred the expression 'in accordance with the law' over 'provided by law' for the limitations clause dealing with freedom of movement, noting the text of article 8(2). It said that 'in accordance with law' was 'better', and that it allowed for administrative action, provided it were taken in accordance with internal legislation.³⁹⁶

The requirement that a restriction or limitation be prescribed by or in accordance with law has both a formal or technical sense and a substantive one. The interference must, of course, be authorized by a rule recognized in the national legal order. This includes 'written law', including various forms of delegated legislation, and unwritten law as interpreted and applied by the courts.³⁹⁷ But there is also a qualitative requirement for the legal rule. It must be accessible and foreseeable. There may be higher expectations in applying the condition depending upon the individuals involved, in light of their training, professional activity, and experience. It may be reasonable to expect them to obtain expert advice on the law, depending upon the circumstances. The law must also be subject to mechanisms so that it can be applied in a manner that is genuine and not arbitrary. If the law grants discretion to public authorities, it must be framed with sufficient clarity and specify the manner in which it is to be exercised.³⁹⁸ The Court is not prescriptive in this respect, acknowledging that States have a 'margin of appreciation' in deciding upon the legal mechanisms by which they limit or restrict the rights set out in the Convention. In effect, the words 'in accordance with the law' refer to the broad, general notion of the 'rule of law'. Often the Court will conclude that the interference is not made 'in accordance with law' or 'provided by law', and find that the Convention has been violated, without considering whether the measure complies with the other two facets of its analysis under paragraph 2.

The degree of precision required of 'law' depends upon the subject-matter. When secret surveillance of communications is concerned, 'it would be contrary to the rule of law for the legal discretion granted to the executive—or to a judge—to be expressed in terms of an unfettered power'. The law must frame the discretion in such a way as to provide adequate protection against arbitrary interference.³⁹⁹ Such secret measures also present problems with respect to the requirement that the legal measure be 'foreseeable', where the Court has held on several occasions that special circumstances exist.⁴⁰⁰ According to the Court,

[F]oreseeability in the special context of secret measures of surveillance, such as the interception of communications, cannot mean that an individual should be able to foresee when the authorities are likely to intercept his communications so that he can adapt his conduct accordingly. However, especially where a power vested in the executive is exercised in secret, the risks of arbitrariness are evident. It is therefore essential to have clear, detailed rules on interception of telephone conversations, especially as the technology available for use is continually becoming more sophisticated. The domestic law must be sufficiently clear in its terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances in which and the conditions on which public authorities are empowered to resort to any such measures. Moreover, since the implementation in practice of measures of secret surveillance of communications is not open to scrutiny by the individuals concerned or the public at large, it would be contrary to the rule of law for the legal discretion granted to the executive or to a judge to be expressed in terms of an unfettered power. Consequently, the law must indicate the scope of any such discretion conferred on the competent authorities and the manner of its exercise with sufficient clarity to give the individual adequate protection against arbitrary interference.⁴⁰¹

Some cases of interference have failed the test, obviating the need for the Court to apply the two other criteria. In the Slovenian 'erasure' case, the Court found the legislation to be insufficient and held there was a violation.⁴⁰² Although the monitoring of legal correspondence of prisoners in Italy was ordered by a judge, the European Court held that the legal prescriptions had not been followed and that consequently the measures were not in accordance with law.⁴⁰³ When a Polish hospital provided information about a patient involved in a controversial abortion decision, the Court noted that there was no provision of national law allowing for such public disclosure, and as a consequence the impugned measure was not 'in accordance with law'.⁴⁰⁴

Legitimate purpose

The issue of the legitimate aim or purpose of an interference is rarely very significant, given the breadth of what is permissible under article 8. It seems that the assessment under article 8(2) does not depend upon what is submitted by the respondent State and apparently sometimes the governments have nothing to say on this point. Article 8(2) permits interference with family and private life, home, and correspondence 'in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others'. The Grand Chamber has explained that it is the Court's practice 'to be quite succinct when it verifies the existence of a legitimate aim within the meaning of the second paragraphs of Articles 8 to 11 of the Convention'.⁴⁰⁵ The list is large enough to cover most government activity, whether it is oppressive or benign. The Court has tended to espouse a rather broad and liberal application of the terms, often finding that more than one of the purposes applies to a specific form of interference.

In a case against Moldova concerning the government's refusal to modify the ethnic identity on official records, no specific legitimate aim was proposed, yet the Court said it was prepared to accept that the measure was to safeguard national security and prevent disorder.⁴⁰⁶ Often several grounds appear to justify the measures in question. In a case involving entry and residence of aliens, the Court thought that several grounds might apply, including the interests of national security, the economic well-being of the country, and the prevention of disorder or crime.⁴⁰⁷ In contrast with the other restriction clauses in the Convention, article 8(2) does not include 'public order' in the list.⁴⁰⁸

A rare example of violation of the Convention being declared because the impugned measure did not serve any legitimate purpose is found in the disclosure by a Polish

hospital of medical information about a patient who was awaiting determination of eligibility for an abortion. The Court said it could not see how release of information about the patient's unwanted pregnancy and the subsequent refusal by hospital authorities to terminate it could fulfil a legitimate aim listed in article 8(2).⁴⁰⁹

In the case concerning statelessness in Slovenia, the Court concluded that legislation requiring citizens of the Socialist Federated Republic of Yugoslavia to opt quickly for Slovenian citizenship at the time of the breakup, in order to create a 'corpus of Slovenian citizens', could be explained by the legitimate purpose of protection of the country's national security.⁴¹⁰

The 'interests of economic well-being' are listed in article 8(2). It is the only one of the four limitations clauses to contain such a reference, although logically there is no good reason why this might not also be applicable in the case of freedom of expression and freedom of association. Occasionally the Court has accepted 'interests of economic well-being' as an acceptable purpose for measures that infringe upon the rights in article 8(1). In a case involving violation of the 'home' of a Roma community, the Court considered there was sufficient evidence of genuine plans for urban development in the area that 'economic well-being' could be considered legitimate.⁴¹¹

A deportation order was justified by the United Kingdom government using several categories of legitimate aim, including 'public safety', 'prevention of disorder or crime', and 'protection of the rights of others'.⁴¹² The Court noted that it had consistently viewed that such expulsion measures fell within the legitimate aim of 'prevention of disorder or crime'.⁴¹³ It referred to authority where the other two grounds had been accepted, but noted that these were not contested by the applicants and therefore of limited authority.⁴¹⁴

In the French burqa case, the Grand Chamber recognized that 'public safety' had been invoked by the legislator as part of the rationale for the ban on covering the face. According to France, the prohibition 'satisfied the need to identify individuals in order to prevent danger for the safety of persons and property and to combat identity fraud'.⁴¹⁵ Protection of 'the rights and freedoms of others' is a legitimate aim that may encompass the promotion of gender equality.⁴¹⁶ In its consideration of the French ban on wearing clothing that covers the face, the Court said it accepted 'that the barrier raised against others by a veil concealing the face is perceived by the respondent State as breaching the right of others to live in a space of socialisation which makes living together easier'.⁴¹⁷

This aim was subsumed within the general concept of 'protection of the rights and freedoms of others'.

Necessary in a democratic society

Most decisions concerning the second paragraph of article 8 involve the third component of the analysis, namely whether the impugned measure is 'necessary in a democratic society'. The objective is to consider whether the authorities have struck 'a fair balance between the competing interests of the individual and of society as a whole'.⁴¹⁸ It is the most subjective part of the application of paragraph 2, involving subtle distinctions about the proportionality of measures taken by the State that limit or restrict human rights. There is an important relationship between 'necessity' and 'democratic society', of which the hallmarks are pluralism, tolerance, and broadmindedness.⁴¹⁹

The Court frequently begins its consideration of this element by questioning whether the interference responds to a 'pressing social need'. The term seems to be not much more than a gloss on the word 'necessity'. It employs two other notions in this context, insisting that the measure in question be 'relevant and sufficient'. The interference must also respond to an assessment of its proportionality, something that necessitates balancing the right of the individual against the interest of the State and the society that it represents. Where the Court is considering the positive dimension of the right in question, in other words, the obligation upon the State to take measures to ensure enforcement of the right, it must usually consider the rights of others in the balance as well. If other less severe measures could have fulfilled the same objective, there will be a problem with proportionality.

Nevertheless, in applying the 'necessary in a democratic society' test, the Court will allow the State a margin of appreciation, recognizing that its role is not to sit as a tribunal of fourth instance and that it is in one sense not as well positioned as the national legal institutions to assess many of the relevant factors. Often, especially in sensitive matters that concern morality, ethics, and social policy, the Court refers to the practice in European jurisdictions in determining whether or not any consensus exists. Where there is none, the margin of appreciation will almost invariably be much greater. But although the national authorities make the initial assessment of necessity, 'the final evaluation as to whether the reasons cited for the interference are relevant and sufficient remains subject to review by the Court for conformity with the requirements of the Convention'.⁴²⁰

Beyond a general presentation of the factors employed by the Court in considering whether an interference is 'necessary in a democratic society', it is difficult to extract any broad themes concerning the application of this concept to the right to private and family life. Certainly, it is under this rubric where significant evolution is likely to take place to the extent that the Court considers controversial moral and ethical issues, such as abortion, sexual orientation and practices, and the termination of life. The Court has said that when intimate areas such as sexual life are in question, the margin of appreciation is narrow.⁴²¹

Discrimination

With respect to discrimination concerning private and family life, home, and correspondence, article 8 is no different than the other provisions of the Convention. Article 14 plays a subsidiary role and in practice it is rarely applied. In many cases, where article 14 has been invoked together with article 8, the Court has found a violation of article 8 and then declared there was no need for a separate discussion or analysis pursuant to article 14.⁴²²

The Court considered that article 14 had been violated in conjunction with article 8 in the case concerning statelessness in Slovenia. As a result of legislation enacted in the aftermath of the breakup of Yugoslavia, there was differential treatment of 'real' aliens—that is, nationals of a State other than the former Yugoslavia—and those who had been nationals of the former Yugoslavia with citizenship in one of its component republics other than Slovenia. The victims, who had become stateless persons, were known as the 'erased'. Noting this differential treatment, which it said was based upon national origin, the Court held that the Convention had been breached.⁴²³ However, the Court rejected a claim based on article 14 in conjunction with article 8 that discrimination based on citizenship in access to the legal profession was contrary to the Convention.⁴²⁴

Upon the death of the lawful tenant, Austrian legislation concerning residential tenancy enabled a lease to pass to a close relative, but this did not apply to the same-sex partner of the deceased. The Court concluded that there was a violation of article 14 in conjunction with article 8.⁴²⁵

In a Greek case, an unmarried member of the clergy adopted a son, who was already an adult at the time, while the two were in the United States. Later, siblings successfully challenged the adoption before the Greek courts, with the consequence of disinheriting the adopted child following the death of the adopting father. The Court held that there was discrimination and applied articles 8 and 14 together. The adopting father had been entitled to marry and to have a family, with the consequence that his natural children would have been heirs, so it was discriminatory for the Greek courts to deny the validity of the adoption and thereby exclude the adopted son from sharing in the estate.⁴²⁶

A person's name belongs to the sphere of private and family life protected by article 8 of the Convention. Legislation requiring a change of name in the case of a woman upon marriage constitutes a violation of article 8 taken together with article 14. The State argued that the requirement promoted family unity by imposing a joint family name, but the Court said this 'cannot provide a justification for the gender-based difference in treatment complained of in the instant case'.⁴²⁷

The Court held that there was a violation of article 14 in conjunction with article 8 with respect to Greek legislation authorizing civil union or civil partnership that excluded same-sex relationships. Citing an emerging trend in Europe, it noted that of the nineteen States that authorize a form of partnership other than marriage, Lithuania and Greece are the only ones to reserve it exclusively to different-sex couples. 'In other words', said the Court, 'with two exceptions, Council of Europe member States, when they opt to enact legislation introducing a new system of registered partnership as an alternative to marriage for unmarried couples, include same-sex couples in its scope.'⁴²⁸ Greece had insisted that the main purpose of its legislation was to provide protection for children of unmarried couples, but the Court said it had not offered 'convincing and weighty reasons capable of justifying the exclusion of same-sex couples'.⁴²⁹

Issues concerning discrimination against same-sex couples have also arisen with respect to what are called 'second-parent adoptions', whereby the partner of the natural parent in such a relationship becomes the adoptive parent of the child. According to a study by the Commissioner on Human Rights, second-parent adoptions benefit the child by providing for two legal guardians. Moreover,

Second-parent adoptions also protect the parents by giving both of them legally recognised parental status. The lack of second-parent adoption deprives the child and the non-biological parent of rights if the biological parent dies or in the case of divorce, separation, or other circumstances that would bar the parent from carrying out parental responsibilities. The child also has no right to inherit from the non-biological parent. Moreover, at an everyday level, the lack of second-parent adoption rules out parental leave, which can be harmful financially for LGBT families. The third procedure is joint adoption of a child by a same sex couple.⁴³⁰

In Austria, where same-sex partnership but not same-sex marriage is authorized by law, the Grand Chamber held that legislation preventing second-parent adoption in same-sex couples violated article 14 in conjunction with article 8. It insisted that the issue arose because the prohibition on such adoptions prevented the courts from examining 'in any meaningful manner' whether the requested adoption was in the interests of the child.⁴³¹ It referred to recent judgments finding a breach of article 14 together with article 8, where the father of a child born outside marriage could not obtain an examination by the domestic courts of whether the award of joint custody to both parents or sole custody to him was in the child's interests.⁴³²

Reservations

Upon ratification in 1982, Liechtenstein made a lengthy reservation to article 8. The second part reserved Liechtenstein's legislation relating to 'the status of illegitimate children' and 'the status of women in matrimonial and family law'. The third reservation to article 8 stated that 'the right to respect for family life, as guaranteed by Article 8 of the Convention, shall be exercised, with regard to aliens, in accordance with the principles at present embodied in the Ordinance of 9 September 1980'. The 1991 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights says that the reservation in respect of article 8 'with regard to homosexuality' had been withdrawn but made no mention of the other reservations.⁴³³ The compilation of reservations in the 1994 Yearbook indicates that the entire reservation to article 8 had been withdrawn in 1991.⁴³⁴ However, this must certainly have been an error, something that was confirmed when in 1999 Liechtenstein withdrew the second of its reservations dealing with 'illegitimate children'.⁴³⁵

Monaco has also formulated a complex reservation that it says applies to articles 6, 8, and 14. It concerns legislation governing authorization to exercise a professional activity and creates a preference for citizens of the country.⁴³⁶

Article 9. Freedom of thought, conscience and religion/Liberté de pensée, de conscience et de religion

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.

2. Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

1. Toute personne a droit à la liberté de pensée, de conscience et de religion; ce droit implique la liberté de changer de religion ou de conviction, ainsi que la liberté de manifester sa religion ou sa conviction individuellement ou collectivement, en public ou en privé, par le culte, l'enseignement, les pratiques et l'accomplissement des rites.

2. La liberté de manifester sa religion ou ses convictions ne peut faire l'objet d'autres restrictions que celles qui, prévues par la loi, constituent des mesures nécessaires, dans une société démocratique, à la sécurité publique, à la protection de l'ordre, de la santé ou de la morale publiques, ou à la protection des droits et libertés d'autrui.

Introductory comments

The second of Franklin D. Roosevelt's four freedoms, proclaimed in his 1941 State of the Union Address, is 'freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—everywhere in the world'. The four freedoms are invoked in the Preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, where the second of the freedoms is formulated as 'freedom of religion'. The four freedoms reappear yet again in the preambles of the two International Covenants. In those instruments, the first freedom (of expression) and the second are collectively referred to as 'civil and political freedoms'. There is no reference to God in the Universal Declaration or, for that matter, in the European Convention on Human Rights. Roosevelt's point was not to focus on monotheistic beliefs but rather to affirm the importance of the freedom of all to their own beliefs, and to that extent the instruments that echo his words are faithful to his intent.

During the drafting of the Universal Declaration, some European states, notably the Netherlands, urged unsuccessfully that a reference to God be included. Ultimately, the Universal Declaration addresses this by reaching a 'a bargain about God and nature', as one scholar has described it.¹ René Cassin later attributed much of its success to '[c]et œcuménisme de la Déclaration. A laquelle les Églises et les Confessions ont donné leur adhésion solonelle, sans abdiquer aucunement leurs dogmes et principes.'² Ireland, which was not yet a member of the United Nations and had therefore not participated in the drafting of the Universal Declaration, favoured some religious references in the European Convention. The founding members of the Council of Europe had a degree of cultural homogeneity that was absent in the United Nations General Assembly, making this in principle considerably easier to accommodate. But like the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the European Convention on Human Rights is a secular instrument. The Court has said that secularism is 'consistent with the values underpinning the Convention'.³ Not only does it remain neutral in terms of any particular religion or confession, it advances visions of human dignity and values that, while certainly compatible with those of established religions, are not essentially spiritual. The role of religion in the lives of many, if not most, Europeans has undoubtedly declined significantly since 1950. Nevertheless, it remains important to many. Some religions, notably Islam, seem to have a new vigour.

Freedom of religion is one of the earliest concerns relating to human rights within the body of public international law. Article XIV of the Treaty of Utrecht of 1713 ceded territory in North America from France to the Britain, but at the same time ensured that French-speaking Catholics who wished to remain were entitled 'to enjoy the free exercise of their religion, according to the usage of the church of Rome, as far as the laws of Great Britain do allow the same'. Freedom of religion was protected by the minorities treaties adopted in the aftermath of the First World War. The 1919 Treaty of Peace with Poland, sometimes called the 'Little Treaty of Versailles', provided that '[a]ll inhabitants of Poland shall be entitled to the free exercise, whether public or private, of any creed, religion or belief, whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals'.⁴ In the letter to President Paderewski of Poland transmitting the treaty, Georges Clemenceau described the article as guaranteeing 'those elementary rights, which are, as a matter of fact, secured in every civilised State'.⁵ Detailed provisions addressed the rights of Jews to public funding of parochial schools and respect for the Jewish Sabbath.⁶ Inevitably, freedom of religion was set out as the first of the fundamental freedoms in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Article 18 states: 'Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.'

One of the first human rights conventions in the United Nations system is the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. At the time it was proposed, in 1962, there were plans for a companion instrument dealing with religious discrimination.⁷ The subject-matter proved more difficult than racial discrimination. No Convention has ever been completed, although the General Assembly did succeed in adopting the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief, in 1981. document enumerates several components of 'the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief':

In accordance with article I of the present Declaration, and subject to the provisions of article 1, paragraph 3, the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief shall include, inter alia, the following freedoms:

- (a) To worship or assemble in connection with a religion or belief, and to establish and maintain places for these purposes;
- (b) To establish and maintain appropriate charitable or humanitarian institutions;
- (c) To make, acquire and use to an adequate extent the necessary articles and materials related to the rites or customs of a religion or belief;
- (d) To write, issue and disseminate relevant publications in these areas;
- (e) To teach a religion or belief in places suitable for these purposes;
- (f) To solicit and receive voluntary financial and other contributions from individuals and institutions;
- (g) To train, appoint, elect or designate by succession appropriate leaders called for by the requirements and standards of any religion or belief;
- (h) To observe days of rest and to celebrate holidays and ceremonies in accordance with the precepts of one's religion or belief;
- (i) To establish and maintain communications with individuals and communities in matters of religion and belief at the national and international levels.⁸

The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union also proclaims the right to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion. The text differs very slightly in formulation compared with article 9 of the European Convention on Human Rights:

Article 10. Freedom of thought, conscience and religion

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right includes freedom to change religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or in private, to manifest religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.

According to the explanatory notes, article 10 of the Charter is meant to have the same meaning and scope as article 9 of the European Convention.⁹ Paragraph 2 of article 10 of the Charter recognizes a right of conscientious objection.

Drafting of the provision

The initial draft European Convention on Human Rights, prepared by the International Juridical Section of the European Movement, contained the following: 'Every State a party to this Convention shall guarantee to all persons within its territory the following rights: . . . e) Freedom of religious belief, practice and teaching.'¹⁰ The European Movement draft also contained a restrictions or limitations clause, inspired by article 29 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: 'The rights specified in Articles 1 and 2 shall be subject only to such limitations as are in conformity with the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations and as are prescribed by law for: a) Protecting the legal rights of others; b) Meeting the just requirements of morality, public order (including the safety of the community), and the general welfare.¹¹

At the first session of the Consultative Assembly, Pierre-Henri Teitgen called for adoption of a convention that would include 'freedom of religious belief, practice and teaching'.¹² Asked to prepare a text for discussion in the Committee on Legal and Administrative Questions at the first session of the Consultative Assembly, Teitgen proposed these words: 'Freedom of religious practice and teaching, in accordance with Article 18 of the United Nations Declaration.'¹³ The Committee adopted the following text: 'Freedom of thought, conscience and religion, in accordance with Article 18 of the Declaration of the United Nations.'¹⁴ In presenting the report of the Commission on Legal and Administrative Questions to the plenary Consultative Assembly, Teitgen said that 'in recommending a collective guarantee not only of freedom to express convictions, but also of thought, conscience, religion and opinion, the Committee wished to protect all nationals of any member State, not only from breaches of obligation for so-called reasons of State, but also from those abominable methods of police enquiry or judicial process which rob the suspected or accused person of control of his intellectual faculties and of conscience'.¹⁵ The sentence proposed by the Committee was adopted without debate by the Consultative Assembly.¹⁶

Teitgen also included a general provision on the restriction or limitation of rights that was based upon the text in the European Movement Draft.¹⁷ After a short debate without a vote, the Consultative Assembly adopted the following text:

In the exercise of these rights, and in the enjoyment of the freedoms guaranteed by the Convention, no limitations shall be imposed except those established by law, with the sole object of ensuring the recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others, or with the purpose of satisfying the just requirement of public morality, order and security in a democratic society.¹⁸

An early draft prepared by Teitgen had included a phrase that was removed in the final version: 'These rights and freedoms may in no case be exercised contrary to the aims and principles of the Council of Europe.'¹⁹

Several amendments to the freedom of religion provision were proposed in the Committee of Experts, which convened in February 1950. From the United Kingdom expert, Sir Oscar Dowson, an amendment that was identical to the draft freedom of religion provision adopted by the Commission on Human Rights for the Covenant on human rights the previous year²⁰ was submitted:

- 1) Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.
- 2) Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are pursuant to law and are reasonable and necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.²¹

At the conclusion of its first session, in February 1950, the Committee of Experts adopted the following provision: 'Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.'²² The report of the Committee explains that instead of enumerating rights by reference to the relevant provision in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as had been done by the Consultative Assembly, it was better to incorporate the text verbatim. Accordingly, the Committee 'scrupulously adhered to the text of the Universal Declaration'.²³ The text it adopted is identical to that of article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The Committee of Experts also adopted a new provision of relevance to the exercise of religious freedom that said nothing in the convention could be considered 'as derogating from already existing national rules as regards religious institutions and foundations or membership of certain confessions'.²⁴ It was derived from proposals made by the Swedish expert²⁵ and the Turkish expert,²⁶ both of whom invoked 'the existence in their countries of certain national laws which might be considered contrary to the right of the free exercise of religion'.²⁷ The report of the Committee of Experts explained that the paragraph 'only applies to existing laws, and may not be invoked to justify new restrictions which might be imposed on the free exercise of religion at a future date'.²⁸ The expert of the Netherlands, with the support of the United Kingdom, objected to the provision, noting that 'the guaranteeing of certain situations of fact, which this provision tends to ensure, do [sic] not justify the incorporation in the text of the Convention of a derogation of such a considerable extent, in spite of the importance they might have'.²⁹

At the second session of the Group of Experts, in March 1950, the United Kingdom representative renewed efforts to promote a text similar to that of the draft United Nations Covenant:

- 1) Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.
- 2) Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in the interests of public safety, or for the protection of public order, health, or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.³⁰

Paragraph 1 was unchanged from Britain's earlier proposal. In paragraph 2, the words 'pursuant to law' were replaced with 'prescribed by law', the words 'reasonable and necessary' became 'necessary', the words 'interests of' had been added immediately before 'public safety', 'order' was replaced with 'or for the protection of public order', and 'the fundamental rights and freedoms of others' replaced by 'the protection of the rights and freedoms of others'. A drafting committee revised the text, adding to paragraph 2 a phrase reflecting the initiatives of the Turkish and Swedish experts: 'provided that nothing in this convention may be considered as derogating from already existing national rules as regards religious institutions, or membership of certain confessions'.³¹ The Committee explained that this was 'intended to cover those reasonable restrictions on the eligibility for public office of members of certain religious faiths which are prescribed in the constitutions of certain States and which, it was recognised, could not be removed immediately'. The ²⁶ Amendment to Article 2 para. 5 of the Recommendation of the Consultative Assembly proposed by the Turkish Expert, Doc. A 787, III TP 196: 'Subject to reservations as regards the measures required for ensuring security and public order, as well as those restrictions which, for reasons of history, it has been considered necessary, by the States, signatories of this Convention, to place on the exercise of this right.'

Report went on to say that the provision was also meant 'to cover similar regulations regarding the membership and the activity of certain religious institutions'.³²

The Committee of Experts concluded its work with the submission to the Committee of Ministers of two different drafts. The first, 'Alternatives A and A/2', consisted of the text reflecting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provision that had been adopted by the Committee of Experts at its first session.³³ The second, labelled 'Alternatives B and B/2', contained a text derived from the draft United Nations Covenant that had been proposed by the United Kingdom.³⁴

The Committee of Experts also adopted a general provision on restrictions or limitations:

In the exercise of these rights and in the enjoyment of the freedoms secured by the Convention, no limitation shall be imposed except those established by the law, with the sole object of ensuring the recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others, or with the purpose of satisfying the just requirements of public morality and order and national security and integrity (and solidarity) as well as the functioning of administration and justice in a democratic society.³⁵

The Report of the Committee of Experts explained that it had decided to add 'to the number of higher interests, the demands of which might justify the limitation of human rights, two further restrictions: a) territorial integrity; b) the smooth working of administration and justice'.³⁶ It said that the first of these had been added on the proposal of the Turkish representative 'in order to make provision for the need of States to be able to defend themselves against all activities which might lead to the disintegration of the nation'.³⁷ This was accepted by the Committee of Experts 'on the clear understanding that it did not permit a restriction on the rights of national minorities to press their views by democratic means', to which the Turkish representative responded that the proposal 'had no connection with the question of the rights of national minorities, a question which, moreover, would be outside the scope of the Convention'.³⁸ The second limitation, 'the smooth working of administration and justice', was introduced by the Swedish expert so as to make provision for the fact that sometimes 'certain information should be kept secret'.³⁹

A 777, III TP 184.

The Conference of Senior Officials that convened in June 1950 assigned a Drafting Committee to attempt to reconcile the competing versions. It prepared a new formulation on freedom of religion based largely on the British proposal, with a few very minor stylistic changes and the addition of the words 'in a democratic society' to paragraph 2.

- 1) Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, in teaching, practice, worship and observance.
- 2) Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in the interests of public safety, or for the protection of public order, health, or morals in a democratic society, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, provided that nothing in this Convention may be considered as derogating from already existing national rules as regards religious institutions and foundations, or membership of certain confessions.⁴⁰

The Drafting Committee revised paragraph 2, removing the final clause that had been proposed initially by experts from Sweden and Turkey and that had provoked so much controversy. The provision then read as follows:

- 2) Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of public safety, or for the protection of public order, health, or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.⁴¹

The texts of the two paragraphs were subsequently confirmed by the Committee of Ministers at its fifth session, in early August 1950. There were only two minor changes: the comma after 'democratic society' in paragraph 2 and the word 'or' after 'public safety' were removed.⁴² There were no further modifications to the text.

The heading, 'Freedom of thought, conscience and religion', was added by Protocol No. 11.⁴³

Analysis and interpretation

As the heading of the provisions indicates, freedom of thought, of conscience, and of religion are all protected by article 9 of the European Convention. Although paragraph 1 of article 9 begins with reference to 'thought, conscience and religion' it subsequently refers, on two occasions, to 'religion and belief' (in French, de religion ou de conviction, sa religion ou sa conviction), and again to 'religion and beliefs' (sa religion ou ses convictions) in paragraph 2. Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 to the Convention, which deals with parental choice of education for their children, speaks of 'religious and philosophical convictions'.

⁴³ Protocol No. 11 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, restructuring the control machinery established thereby, ETS 155, art. 2(2).

Most of the case law is about religion, but the importance of freedom of thought and conscience cannot be overlooked.⁴⁴ It is said that '[r]eligious freedom is primarily a matter of individual thought and conscience',⁴⁵ a useful way of linking the three concepts in the first sentence of article 9(1). But freedom of thought and conscience also go beyond being a rationale for the protection of religious freedom.

There are three components of the freedom defined in article 9(1): the freedom of thought, conscience, and religion as such; the freedom to change one's religion or belief; and the freedom to manifest religion or belief. Unlike the other fundamental freedoms set out in articles 8, 9, 10, and 11 of the Convention, freedom of thought, conscience, and religion, as well as the freedom to change one's religion or belief, have an absolute nature.⁴⁶ In practice, they do not often create much difficulty. They cannot be limited or restricted in any way. '[A] State cannot dictate what a person believes or take coercive steps to make him change his beliefs',⁴⁷ the Court has said. This can be seen when paragraph 1 of article 9 is juxtaposed against paragraph 2, a provision that applies only to freedom to manifest religion or belief.⁴⁸ Indeed, it is essentially the third component—the manifestation of religion or belief—that raises difficulties. Because manifestation of religious belief may impact upon others, paragraph 2 of article 9 provides for limitations to be imposed using a formulation similar to that in the equivalent paragraphs of articles 8, 10, and 11. Any limitation must be prescribed by law, it must have a legitimate purpose, and it must be necessary in a democratic society.

In theory, although freedom of thought, conscience, and religion, and the freedom to change religion or belief, are not subject to limitations or restrictions, they could still be subject to derogation under article 15(1) of the Convention. It is unclear what this would entail. In one of its General Comments, the United Nations Human Rights Committee observed that derogation from certain rights cannot have any real or practical consequences, giving freedom of conscience as an example.⁴⁹

In its religious dimension, the right set out in article 9 is 'one of the most vital elements that go to make up the identity of believers and their conception of life, but it is also a precious asset for atheists, agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned'.⁵⁰ It entails 'freedom to hold or not to hold religious beliefs and to practise or not to practise a religion'.⁵¹ Article 9 primarily protects 'the sphere of personal beliefs and religious creeds, that is, the area which is sometimes called the forum internum'.⁵² The Court has held that the term 'beliefs' in article 9, like the term 'convictions' in article 2 of Protocol No. 1, denotes views that attain a certain level of cogency, seriousness, cohesion, and importance.⁵³ For the Grand Chamber, 'supporters of secularism are able to lay claim to views attaining the "level of cogency, seriousness, cohesion and importance" required for them to be considered "convictions" within the meaning of Articles 9 of the Convention and 2 of Protocol No. 1'.⁵⁴

Freedom of thought, conscience, and religion is one of the foundations of a 'democratic society' within the meaning of the Convention. As the Court has often said, '[t]he pluralism indissociable from a democratic society, which has been dearly won over the centuries, depends on it'.⁵⁵ In promoting this value, the role of the authorities is not 'to remove the cause of tension by eliminating pluralism, but to ensure that the competing groups tolerate each other'.⁵⁶ But pluralism also brings with it the need for restraints: '[I]n a democratic society, in which several religions coexist within one and the same population, it may be necessary to place restrictions on this freedom in order to reconcile the interests of the various groups and ensure that everyone's beliefs are respected'.⁵⁷

An early decision of the European Commission holds that article 9 can only be invoked by a natural person.⁵⁸

Positive obligation or interference

The methodology for examining whether article 9 has been observed involves initially determining whether the provision applies at all. Once this has been established, it is generally necessary to examine whether a positive obligation has been involved or whether there has been an interference with the right. When the alleged violation cannot directly be attributed to the State, it may nevertheless have a positive obligation to secure rights under article 9 to those within its jurisdiction.

In matters involving a positive obligation, the Court will determine whether measures have been taken that are reasonable and appropriate. For example, where a religious meeting held by Jehovah's Witnesses was broken up with considerable violence, the Court found that there had been a violation of the Convention because 'the relevant authorities failed in their duty to take the necessary measures to ensure that the group of Orthodox extremists led by Father Basil tolerated the existence of the applicants' religious community and enabled them to exercise freely their rights to freedom of religion'.⁵⁹

Otherwise, the question to be addressed is whether there has been an interference with the right by the State. If this is the conclusion, the analysis then proceeds to article 9(2), where the Court begins by inquiring as to whether the interference has been 'provided by law'. If the Court concludes there is no interference, the application will be dismissed without paragraph 2 even being considered. In Skugar v. Russia, the applicant objected to a taxpayer identification number that she said contained a number that 'was a forerunner of the mark of the Antichrist'. The Court held that 'general legislation which applies on a neutral basis without any link whatsoever with an applicant's personal beliefs cannot in principle be regarded as an interference'.⁶⁰ The European Commission reached a similar conclusion dealing with an application from a Quaker who refused to pay taxes destined for military expenditure. The Commission said 'the obligation to pay taxes is a general one which has no specific conscientious implications in itself'. It held that 'Article 9 does not confer on the applicant the right to refuse to abide by legislation... which applies neutrally and generally in the public sphere, without impinging on the freedoms guaranteed by Article 9'.⁶¹

Obviously, in the case of a positive obligation where a non-State actor is involved there can be no question about the interference being 'provided by law'. The whole point is whether the violation attributable to a third party is addressed by the State. However, the Court has often said that although 'the boundary between the State's positive and negative obligations under the Convention does not lend itself to precise definition, the applicable principles are, nonetheless, similar'. In other words, a fair balance must be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole, subject to the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the State.⁶² Although not directly applicable, 'in relation to the positive obligations flowing from the first paragraph of Article 9, in striking the required balance the aims mentioned in the second paragraph may be of a certain relevance'.⁶³

The Court has invoked the notion of positive obligations as a justification for measures that attempt to educate or warn the public about what it considers to be dangerous religious practices or activities. In a German case, it referred to 'the increasing number of new religious and ideological movements [that] generated conflict and tension in German society, raising questions of general importance', and said that the German authorities, 'by providing people in good time with explanations it considered useful at that time, was aiming to settle a burning public issue and attempting to warn citizens against phenomena it viewed as disturbing, for example, the appearance of numerous new religious movements and their attraction for young people'.⁶⁴ In so doing, it was addressing an 'interference imputable to private individuals within non-State entities'.⁶⁵

Freedom of thought

Benjamin Franklin said that 'Without freedom of thought there can be no such thing as wisdom...' In the constitutional case law of the United States, the right to freedom of thought has been linked to freedom of speech. The two were described by Supreme Court Justice Benjamin Cardozo as 'the matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other form of freedom. With rare aberrations a pervasive recognition of this truth can be traced in our history, political and legal.'⁶⁶

Within European human rights law, very little has been said on freedom of thought as such. Loukis Loucaides, who served as both a judge on the Court and a member of the Commission, has suggested that '[t]his may be attributed to the fact that freedom of thought as a general rule may create a problem only when manifested through the expression of ideas or beliefs in which case other safeguarded rights, such as the freedom of expression or the freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs come into play and may be invoked and applied instead of freedom of thought.'⁶⁷ Reference has been made to Pierre-Henri Teigen's comment during the drafting of article 9. He explained that the intent was 'to protect all nationals of any member State, not only from breaches of obligation for so-called reasons of State, but also from those abominable methods of police enquiry or judicial process which rob the suspected or accused person of control of his intellectual faculties and of conscience',⁶⁸ although more in terms of the relevance to articles 3 and 5 than to article 9.⁶⁹

In its General Comment on article 18 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which is very similar in wording to article 9 of the European Convention, the Human Rights Committee 'draws the attention of States parties to the fact that the freedom of thought and the freedom of conscience are protected equally with the freedom of religion and belief'.⁷⁰

Freedom of conscience

'Conscience' seems to be much closer to religion than 'thought' in the sense that religious ideas may emerge from one's 'conscience'. Religious beliefs have been described as 'a matter of individual conscience'.⁷¹ By contrast, 'thoughts' about scientific issues, about whether or not the earth is flat and whether it may revolve around the sun, and of what matter may be composed, and how wealth is created, may be derived from the study of facts rather than probing of the conscience. There may be some preference for the term 'freedom of conscience' instead of 'freedom of religion' because it clarifies the position of atheists and agnostics, and those who profess no religion, yet are possessed of an

'individual conscience'. The moral or ethical dimension of 'conscience' may be underscored by the reference in the Preamble of the Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907 to 'the protection and the rule of the principles of the law of nations, as they result from the usages established among civilised peoples, from the laws of humanity, and the dictates of the public conscience'.⁷² The Preamble to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court refers to 'unimaginable atrocities that deeply shock the conscience of humanity'.⁷³

Like freedom of thought, there is very little in the case law of the Convention organs on freedom of conscience per se. In an individual opinion concerning the refusal of a local official to officiate at same-sex civil partnership ceremonies, Judges Vučinić and De Gaetano insisted that this was not a case of freedom of religion so much as one of freedom of conscience. They said there was a fundamental difference between the two, something evident by the presence of the word 'conscience' in paragraph 1 of article 9 but not in paragraph 2, where it is 'conspicuously absent'. They wrote:

Conscience—by which is meant moral conscience—is what enjoins a person at the appropriate moment to do good and to avoid evil. In essence it is a judgment of reason whereby a physical person recognises the moral quality of a concrete act that he is going to perform, is in the process of performing, or has already completed. This rational judgment on what is good and what is evil, although it may be nurtured by religious beliefs, is not necessarily so, and people with no particular religious beliefs or affiliations make such judgments constantly in their daily lives. The pre-eminence (and the ontological roots) of conscience is underscored by the words of a nineteenth century writer who noted that '... Conscience may come into collision with the word of a Pope, and is to be followed in spite of that word.'⁷⁴

Their omission of 'conscience' in article 9(2) was explained by the fact that religious prescription, such as dietary laws, dress codes, and display of religious symbols, may be subject to limitations whereas prescriptions of conscience may not. 'We are of the view that once that a genuine and serious case of conscientious objection is established, the State is obliged to respect the individual's freedom of conscience both positively (by taking reasonable and appropriate measures to protect the rights of the conscientious objector) and negatively (by refraining from actions which punish the objector or discriminate against him or her)', they wrote.⁷⁵ 'In our view the State's margin of appreciation, whether wide or narrow, does not enter into the equation in matters of individual moral conscience.'⁷⁶

In a decision relating to objections to hunting of animals, Judge Pinto de Albuquerque referred to the German federal Constitutional Court's pronouncement that a decision of conscience is a 'serious ethical decision, i.e., one based on the categories of "good" and "bad", by which an individual in a certain situation feels unconditionally bound in his or her innermost self, so that he or she could not act against it without serious qualms of conscience'.⁷⁷

Freedom of religion (and belief)

The first sentence of article 9, as well as the title, refers to 'freedom of... religion'. Subsequently, the word 'religion' is linked to the word 'belief' (in French, convictions), a word that is not present in the first sentence. The word 'belief' is used in the plural alongside religion. According to the Court, in principle the right to freedom of religion for the purposes of the Convention excludes assessment by the State of the legitimacy of religious beliefs or the ways in which those beliefs are expressed.⁷⁸

Determining whether something constitutes 'thought' or 'conscience' has not posed particular difficulties, but the same cannot be said of religion. There are established or traditional religions in Europe and several States have official religions. Alongside the major religions are religious groups that result from schisms within the mainstream organization or confession. For a significant period in the history of modern Europe the continent was wracked by religious wars associated with such divisions. In addition, there are so-called sects that generally emerge from outside the traditional religions and often do not really resemble them. Such sects may claim to be recognized as a religion and thereby benefit from certain legal advantages.⁷⁹

The 'Church of Scientology' has been active throughout the continent since its establishment half a century ago. According to the European Court, whether Scientology may be called a 'religion' is a matter of controversy among member States.⁸⁰ It has taken the view that absent a European consensus on the religious nature of certain 'teachings', and "being sensitive to the subsidiary nature of its role, the Court considers that it must rely on the position of the domestic authorities in the matter and determine the applicability of Article 9 of the Convention accordingly".⁸¹ Because the Russian authorities have treated Scientology as a religion, the Court has examined allegations of interference under the rubric of article 9.⁸² On the other hand, the Court has been far less prepared to tolerate resistance in some States to the recognition of the Jehovah's Witnesses as a fully fledged religion.⁸³

In a German case involving the Osho movement, the Court avoided the issue by referring to 'belief' rather than religion. It said that the applicant association operated meditation centres, organized seminars, and carried out joint work projects. According to its teachings, 'the aim of spiritual development is enlightenment'. Its conception of the world was 'based on the idea of achieving transcendence in all essential areas of life and is continuously shared by them and their community'. These were, said the Court, 'the
